All the principles set forth are of primary significance and, accordingly, they will be equally and unreservedly applied, each of them being interpreted taking into account the others.

The participating States express their determination fully to respect and apply these principles, as set forth in the present Declaration, in all aspects, to their mutual relations and co-operation in order to ensure to each participating State the benefits resulting from the respect and application of these principles by all.

The participating States, paying due regard to the principles above and, in particular, to the first sentence of the tenth principle, "Fulfillment in good faith of obligations under international law", note that the present Declaration does not affect their rights and obligations, nor the corresponding treaties and other agreements and arrangements.

The participating States express the conviction that respect for these principles will encourage the development of normal and friendly relations and the progress of co-operation among them in all fields. They also express the conviction that respect for these principles will encourage the development of political contracts among them which in turn would contribute to better mutual understanding of their positions and views.

The participating States declare their intention to conduct their relations with all other States in the spirit of the principles contained in the present declaration.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, it is appropriate that we reaffirm our commitment to these principles as we prepare for the Vienna Review Meeting, which will discuss their implementation. Freedom is the inalienable and universal right of all men and women. The Helsinki process has become a key element of our enduring commitment to its protection and promotion. But our work is far from complete. Millions continue to suffer under repressive regimes in the Soviet Union, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Hungary, Poland, and Romania. Let us not evade the difficulties which Dr. Sakharov referred to, but redouble our efforts in the promotion of individual human rights.●

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 153—RELATING TO A MOMENT OF SILENCE FOR THE RETURN OF THE AMERICAN CAPTIVES IN LEBANON

SASSER, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. NUNN, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. GORE, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. HATCH, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. EVANS, Mr. PRYOR, and Mrs. KASSEBAUM) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. CON. RES. 153

Whereas the Statue of Liberty stands as a tribute to the principles of freedom;

Whereas this year, the United States will rededicate itself to the freedom and dignity of all people by relighting the torch of the Statue of Liberty;

Whereas on July 4th the United States will again celebrate its independence; and

Whereas Father Lawrence Martin Jenco, Terry Anderson, David Jacobsen, Thomas Sutherland and William Buckley remain captive in Lebanon: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that during the official ceremony of the lighting of the torch of the Statue of Liberty, a moment of silence be held and that the light of hope for the return of the Americans held captive in Lebanon be rekindled.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 154—REGARDING THE UKRAINIAN HELSINKI MONITORING GROUP

Mr. D'AMATO (for himself and Mr. DECONCINI) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

S. CON. RES. 154

Whereas on August 1, 1975, the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe was signed at Helsinki, Finland, by 33 European states, together with Canada and the United States;

Whereas the signatories of the Helsinki Final Act committed themselves under Principle VII to "respect human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief, for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion;

Whereas Principle VII specifically confirms the "right of the individual to know and act upon his rights and duties" in the field of human rights, and Principle IX of the Final Act confirms the relevant and positive role organizations and persons can play in contributing toward the achievement of cooperation among nations;

Whereas the signing of the Final Act raised the expectations of the peoples of the Soviet Union for greater observance by the Soviet Union of human rights, and engendered the formation of the Moscow, Lithuanian, Georgian, Armenian, and Ukrainian citizens' monitoring groups to inform the peoples of the Soviet Union and the world with regard to the Soviet Government's compliance with the Final Act;

Whereas affiliated groups—the Psychiatric Abuse Commission, the Christian Committee, the Adventists Rights Group, the Catholic Committee, the Ukrainian Catholic Initiative Commitee, and the Disabled Rights Group—later were established by citizens to address areas of specific concern;

Whereas four members of Helsinki Monitoring Groups, Oleksiy Tykhy, Yuri Lytvyn, and Vasyl Stus of the Ukrainian Group and Eduard Arutunyan of the Armenian Group, died after years of inhumane treatment in Soviet labor camps;

Whereas November 9, 1986, marks the tenth anniversary of the establishment of the largest such citizens group, the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote the Implementation of the Helsinki Accords;

Whereas the establishment of this group coincides with the opening on November 4, 1986, of the Vienna Review Meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe;

Whereas the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group opened a new phase in the Ukrainian struggle for human and national rights, providing impetus for human rights activists to demand not only that the Soviet Government uphold the human rights guaranteed by the Soviet Constitution, the Helsinki Final Act, and other international human rights declarations and covenants, but also to assert that the Western democracies have a solemn responsiblity to support the struggle for achievement of human rights of Ukrainians and other peoples living under Soviet domination;

Whereas the Soviet Union continues to violate the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Final Act and other international human rights declarations and covenants by denying to the citizens of Ukraine and other Soviet Republics rights of national identity and basic human rights through intensified russification, ethnocide, repression, and imprisonment of the citizens of Ukraine and other Soviet Republics who lawfully engage in calling the Soviet Government to account for violations of human, national, and religious rights as well as the rights of family reunification and emigration; and

Whereas the blatant disregard by the Soviet Union of the humanitarian provisions of the Helsinki Final Act and other international human rights declarations and covenants, in particular its persecution of the members of Ukrainian and other public Helsinki Monitoring Groups, contribute to tensions between East and West and give rise to doubts about Soviet commitments to their international obligations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring),

SECTION 1. DISCUSSIONS WITH THE SOVIET UNION CONCERNING THE UKRAINIAN AND OTHER PUBLIC HELSINKI MONITORING GROUPS.

It is the sense of Congress that the President and the Secretary of State should firmly insist at the Vienna Review Meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, and at all other appropriate opportunities for discussions with the leadership of the Communist Party and Government of the Soviet Union, that—

(1) imprisoned and exiled members of the Ukrainian and other public Helsinki Monitoring Groups in the Soviet Union be released from their incarceration in the spirit of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe; and

(2) members of the Ukrainian and other public Helsinki Monitoring Groups be allowed to emigrate to the countries of their choice.

SEC. 2. INFORMATION ON HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS IN THE UKRAINIAN REPUBLIC.

It is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the Secretary of State should ensure that the United States consulate in Kiev reports on Soviet human rights violations in the Ukrainian Republic, and

(2) information provided by that consulate on those violations should be included in the semi-annual reports on compliance with the Helsinki Final Act which are submitted by the President to the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe pursuant to Public Law 94-304.

SEC. 3. TRANSMITTAL OF RESOLUTION TO PRESIDENT AND SECRETARY OF STATE.

The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Secretary of State.

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to submit a concurrent resolution commemorating the 10th anniversary of the founding of the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote the Observance of the Helsinki accords. In addition, it calls upon the President and Secretary of State to raise with Soviet authorities the issue of repression of human rights activists.

The Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group, the largest of its kind, was formed to monitor Soviet compliance with the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Final Act, an agreement signed in 1975 by 35 nations, including the United States and the Soviet Union. This group of private citizens, led by Mykola Rudenko, was established on November 9, 1976, in Kiev, Ukraine.

Similar groups were organized in Moscow, Lithuania, Georgia, and Armenia. In addition, special affiliated groups included: the Psychiatric Abuse Commission, the Christian Committee, the Adventists Rights Group, the Lithuanian Catholic Committee, the Ukrainian Catholic Initiative Group, and the Disabled Rights Group.

Of the 37 Ukrainian monitors, all but one have been subjected to long terms in labor camp and internal exile. Sixteen remain in prison or exile. Three others died while serving camp terms under the extremely harsh conditions.

The work of the group underscores the Ukrainian drive for individual freedom and national self-determination. Since the early 1920's the people of Ukraine have struggled to break the chains of Soviet domination. Seven millon Ukrainians died between 1932-33 as a result of Stalin's artificially induced famine. During the Second World War, Ukrainian partisans fought both the Nazis and the Soviets.

Forty million Ukrainians continue to seek those basic human rights guaranteed by the Helsinki Final Act and other international agreements. The harsh treatment of members of the Ukrainian Monitoring Group by Soviet authorities demonstrates the failure of the Soviet Union to live up to its pledges.

The Soviets continue to pursue a brutal policy of russification designed to strip Ukrainians of their rich heritage and culture. Churches have been destroyed, publishing of material in Ukrainian has nearly come to a halt, and Russian is taught instead of the native language.

In addition about 40 percent of known Soviet political prisoners are Ukrainian. Among them is Yuriy Shukhevych, a Ukrainian prisoner of conscience who has spent more than 34-years of his life in Soviet Prisons, labor camps, and internal exile. The son of Roman Shukhevych, commander of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army [UPA], Yuriy was first arrested at the age of 15 because he refused to renounce his father and the cause of Ukrainian independence. Despite his own travail, Shukhevych has emerged as an advocate of human rights for those living under Soviet rule. In January 1979, while still in prison, he became a member of the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group.

Recent events in connection with the disaster at Chernobyl also raise serious questions regarding Soviet discrimination against citizens of Ukraine. Many Ukrainian-Americans have not been allowed to contact friends and loved ones in the aftermath of the accident, despite provisons of the Helsinki Final Act which gurarantee such contacts. Others have been frustrated in their efforts to send assistance to victims of the tragedy. The Soviet response to Chernobyl demonstrates that, despite an extensive disinformation campaign, the Kremlin is as closed as ever. Instead of genuine reform, Gorbachev continues to pursue the same old policies followed by his predecessors.

I urge my colleagues to support this concurrent resolution as an expression of solidarity with members of the Helsinki monitoring and affiliated groups, including members of the Ukrainian Monitoring Group, who have remained steadfast in their pursuit of individual human rights. Together, they are a shining example of human courage and dedication to the highest principles of human civilization.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 435—TO RECOGNIZE THE CONTRIBUTIONS OF EUGENE LANG

Mr. MOYNIHAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. RES. 435

Whereas the number of young peole who fail to graduate is unacceptable in many high schools, especially in urban areas; and

Whereas failure to graduate deprives these young people of many employment opportunities and further educational opportunities; and

Whereas many disadvantaged young people are never encouraged to pursue a college education and are unaware of scholarship opportunities; and

Whereas Eugene Lang's donation of time and money to the Class of 1981 at P.S. 121 in East Harlem has provided every class member the opportunity to attend college; and

Whereas 50 of 51 class members are expected to attend college because of Mr. Lang's efforts in an area where the dropout rate approaches 75 percent; and

Whereas six new sponsors have offered the same opportunity to 425 schoolchildren in New York City and Mr. Lang has established the "I Have a Dream Foundation" to replicate his idea in other cities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, that it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) Eugene Lang is to be commended for his recognition of a serious problem in inner city schools and his contribution of time and money to correct it. His efforts have provided disadvantaged young people the incentive and the means to finish high school and attend college.

(2) Americans are encouraged to use their time and resources to give disadvantaged young people educational opportunities they do not normally have.

SENATE RESOLUTION 436—REGARDING THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN INTERNATIONAL TRADE AND FINANCING DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. KERRY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

S. RES. 436

Resolved, That this resolution may be cited as the "International Development Resolution of 1986".

SEC. 1. The Senate finds that—

(1) international trade and finance are so inter-related that both condition international development and impact on national economic decisionmaking and foreign policy formulation;

(2) current levels of developing country debt stifle exports from the United States, place downward pressures on commodity prices, and jeopardize the commercial financial system;

(3) the international debt crisis forces debtor nations to reduce their consumption of products to the United States and to increase exports competing with American products, thereby causing injury to the manufacturing base of the United States and job dislocation for our workers;

(4) the size and composition of the United States trade deficit and the overexposure of United States financial institutions assisting with the balance of payments problems of developing countries reflect the most obvious detrimental consequences of the debt crisis;

(5) the strictly case-by-case financial approach to dealing with the debt international debt crisis has failed to enhance the international trading system or result in the resumption of normal and predictable levels of private and public lending to debt-ridden nations of the third world;

(6) it is in the national interest of the United States and other nations of the world to participate in an open and fair international trading system, to contribute to the stabilization of the international financial system, and to promote national economic growth as a process mutually beneficial to industrial and developing nations alike:

(7) the persistence of the current economic crisis makes necessary the adoption of extraordinary measures to resolving this crisis.

SEC. 2. It is the policy of the United States—

(1) to promote international development through the formulation of trade and financial policies designed to strengthen international cooperation which accommodates the mutual interests of the industrialized and developing nations in a growth-oriented world economy:

(2) to support, with positive incentives, the enhancement of freer and fairer international trade;

(3) to support improvements in the mechanisms of international lending in order to provide for market stabilization and to strengthen the integrity of the international financial system; and

(4) to establish an international trade and finance development program which can deal effectively with ameliorating the international debt crisis.

SEC. 3. The purposes of an international trade and finance development program should be—

(1) to strengthen international economic relations among the participants in this program, through the coordinated and equitable appropriation of financial resources, the allocation of which, under this program's criteria, would be to provide inducements for increasing the imports of developing nations and the stablization of international financial markets;

(2) to strengthen economic growth in developing nations by increasing their participation in the world trading system through alleviation of their debt burden;

(3) to contribute to the stabilization of financial markets by mitigating the negative impact of the debt crisis on private financial institutions, thereby avoiding the potential of widespread bankruptcy while re-establishing the creditworthiness of debtor nations which, in turn, would allow the resumption of normal international commercial lending;

(4) To establish a basis for economic cooperation among sovereign nations, which enhances multilateralism and burdensharing and prevents the politicization of international trade and finance.

SEC. 4. It is the sense of the Senate that the President should instruct the Permanent Representative of the United States to the United Nations to propose an agreement on international trade and finance development which provides for—

(1) the establishment of a progressive cap to limit the external public debt-service payments of developing nations based upon their net trade performance, as an inducement for the reduction of developing nation trade surpluses through increased imports;

(2) the establishment of an alternative progressive scale on public debt-service payments relief for trade deficit developing nations, so as to assure that their import capacity is sustained and external economic adjustment is growth-oriented;

(3) the establishment of conditions for the repayment of external public debt-service of developing nations, for which debt relief was accorded, in order to assure the non-capitalization of interest on the rescheduled debt during the grace period and fixed interest rates during the maturity period, and which assure creditor commercial banks full debt repayment at market interest rates in return for eliminating interest spreads or commissions;

(4) the allocation of resources by industrialized nations, the contribution of which would be proportional to the effective benefit derived from the increase in trade among the parties, the said amount of which would be available only to fund the financial operations of the agreement;

(5) the deposit by developing nations seeking debt relief of 10 percent of the total amount of their annual debt relief for use under the agreement to cover potential defaults;

(6) the establishment of an International Trade and Finance Development Council, comprised of a Board of Directors and an Executive-Secretary who would decide by equal vote on the Program's statutory provisions required to implement the agreement;

(7) representation on the Board of Directors, which should be regional in nature and shall include representation from the International Monetary Fund, the Bank for International Reconstruction and Development, and the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs;

(8) the termination of the agreement at the end of five years.

SEC. 7. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the President.

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I am submitting today the International Development Resolution of 1986, expressing the sense of the Senate regarding the establishment of an international trade and financing development program. This program is designed to provide a comprehensive solution to the debt crisis which affects Latin America and other Third World nations, and which threatens the U.S. economy as well.

This proposal is explained in detail in a background paper accompanying the resolution, which I will place in the RECORD in the near future. Basically, the plan circumvents the failed case-by-case approach of the Baker plan, and provides a comprehensive approach to the debt problem, one which is mutually beneficial to both developing nations and to the American ecomony. This plan would provide incentives to debtor nations to increase their imports of U.S. goods, without affecting their export capacity. It would improve the current U.S. trade deficit, and would provide jobs for the American worker. It would also guarantee to U.S. banks eventual repayment of their outstanding loans to debtor nations, loans which would otherwise have to be written off in all likelihood. This plan would stabilize the international financial system, and would promote economic growth in a process mutually beneficial to both industrial and developing nations.

The present debt crisis is a threat not only to the economies of Latin American and other developing nations. It is also a threat to the forces of democracy which are sweeping throughout Latin America and other Third World nations such as the Philippines. At present, the debt crisis creates an intolerable burden on many Third World countries. With those economic pressures come political pressures, which threaten the fragile democracies of many developing nations. In order for those democracies to flourish, they must have stable economic conditions which allow for economic growth. The present Baker plan for dealing with the debt has failed to provide the conditions for economic growth. In order to encourage the process of democratic change, and create the conditions for economic growth in developing countries, a new approach is needed.

The plan which I have outlined would provide a fresh approach. In simple terms, it would provide for the establishment of a progressive cap to limit the external public debt-service payments of developing nations, based upon their net trade performance, as an inducement for the reduction of developing nation trade surpluses through increased imports. It would also establish an alternative progressive scale for public debt-service payment relief for developing nations, to assure that their import capacity is sustained, and to ensure that external economic adjustment is growth oriented. And it would establish conditions for the repayment of the external public debt of developing nations, which would assure creditor commercial banks full debt repayment, in return for eliminating interest spreads or commissions on the rescheduled debt.

This plan would involve the cooperation and participation of both developing and developed nations, and would be beneficial to both. I believe that it is a real and viable alternative to the present administration policy. The Baker plan, on its own terms, has failed. It is time for a new approach, one which is creative, and one which can work. The plan which I am presenting today creates an alternative which represents a realistic solution to the debt crisis. I hope that my colleagues will join in support of this plan.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 437—RELATING TO UPCOMING ELECTIONS IN MEXICO

Mr. DECONCINI submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 437

Whereas the great nation of Mexico has been a helpful and constructive United States ally and neighbor;

Whereas Mexico's stability and prosperity is crucial to peace and progress in the Americas;

Whereas the rich cultural diversity and vibrant society of Mexico is experiencing severe economic problems, and the United States and other nations can do no less than assist in this time of economic stress;

Whereas Mexico in its long-range commitment to popular democracy has been a role model for other developing nations;

Whereas President de la Madrid has pledged that elections in Mexico would be clean and "morally renovated" upon his election to the presidency;

Whereas the mid-term municipal elections in December 1984 led to Mexican and international accusations of massive fraud and bribery and resulted in damaging this proud nation's status as a democratic leader in Latin American countries that claim that their political systems are responding to social pressures through democratic change;

Whereas at least three people and possibly as many as eleven were killed and scores injured in January 1986 when protests against alleged fraud in municipal elections forced police to move against demonstrators;

Whereas the Mexican newspaper of Monterrey, El Norte, documented 1,065 incidents of fraud in 14 hours—from ballot box stuffing to disappearances of election officials—after setting up their network of reporters in the July 1985 mid-term elections;

Whereas an Arizona newspaper reported a bus full of voters from the State of Chihuahua pulling into the neighboring Sonoran town of Agua Prieta to vote illegally;

Whereas with economic problems increasing, oil prices dropping, and social unrest growing, Mexico can offer its electorate an opportunity to speak out and share in the country's future through the ballot box;

Whereas the political, social, and economic stability of Mexico is inexticably intertwined with the United States as events in one country inevitably and increasingly influence the other; and

Whereas municipal and gubernatorial elections throughout Mexico beginning in July 1986 and lasting for six months will provide an opportunity to reflect the Mexican peoples desire for and the government's commitment to fostering the growth of democratic institutions: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That (a) it is the sense of the Senate that the longstanding friendship between Mexico and the United States is best served by the commitment of these countries to democratic freedoms and institutions.

(b) Placing the highest priority on this commitment, the Senate hereby—

(1) urges the President of Mexico to live up to his pledge to achieve morally renovated elections and open the one-party system of Mexico to greater democratic freedoms in the upcoming State and municipal elections;

(2) encourage the Government of Mexico to appoint a special independent citizen body representing all the recognized political parties for the purpose of objectively evaluating and monitoring those elections and working with the Commission Federal Electoral (CFE); and

(3) stresses that the great nation of Mexico should continue its long-term commitment to democratic principles and its leadership role in the Americas to promote democracy.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the President.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, last week my distinguished colleague from Texas, Senator BENTSEN, eloquently discussed the situation in Mexico. I listened intently to his statement and, as another Senator sharing a long border with Mexico, I agree with many of his insightful remarks. In particular, I would like to quote specifically from his talk:

We are not always going to find that our policies are in concurrence or agreement.

That is the way it is between two major nations living side by side as neighbors. This is a tough time for Mexico. It is a time when we should offer understanding and cooperation on the problems that we all agree exist.

I respect Mexico's sovereignty and autonomy. I respect this great nation's rich cultural diversity and vibrant society. I also value their close friendship. This is why I am introducing a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate that the Government of Mexico should continue its long-term commitment to democracy and open its one-party system to greater democratic freedoms in the upcoming elections. The longstanding friendship between Mexico and the United States is best served by the commitment of these countries to democratic freedoms and institutions.

This resolution places the highest priority on this mutual responsibility and thereby urges the President of Mexico to live up to his pledge to achieve "morally renovated" elections and open the one-party system of Mexico to greater democratic freedoms in the upcoming state and municipal elections. President de la Madrid achieved initial progress in this area but subsequent reports have indicated electoral fraud and abuse in the most recent elections. This abuse includes ballot stuffing, vanishing election officials, and fraudulent voter lists.

Second, this resolution encourages the Government of Mexico to appoint a special independent citizen body representing all the recognized political parties for the purpose of objectively monitoring and evaluating these elections and working with the Commission Federal Electoral [CFE]. While I recognize that many Central and Latin American democracies allow international observers to watch election returns, I do not believe this is called for in Mexico's situation. I do think that, given the volatile situation in Mexico, this could vent some discontent by allowing opposition parties a fairer chance in the elections.

This resolution also stresses that the great nation of Mexico should continue its long-term commitment to democratic principles and its leadership role in the Americas to promote democracy. Mexico has supported the overall endeavor of democracy and the press, while under some control, is increasingly vocal and critical of the Government. Mexico supports a diplomatic solution to the problems in Nicaragua. Admittedly, the opposition political parties have yet to win a governor's race. A crucial contest between the PRI [Institutional Revolutionary Party] and the PAN [National Action Party] will take place July 6 in Chihuahua. This must not be perceived as fair and a legitimate reflection of the Mexican electorate in Chihuahua.

I fully recognize the nature of this challenge to the Mexican Government. This will echo instantly from Mexico City to Nogales to Washington. DC. For Mexico is our third largest trading partner, after Canada and Japan. They supply the United States with more oil than any other country. Its precarious economy threatens the stability of many American banks. The influx of immigrants into the United States has transformed cities from San Diego to Chicago. But it would be a mistake not to challenge Mexico to continue its commitment to democratic principles and freedoms. It would be a mistake not to invite President de la Madrid to live up to his pledge to "morally renovate" the elections. It would be a mistake to think that Mexico cannot meet this challenge.

Nowhere else in the world, Mr. President, does a developing country like Mexico share an undefendable 2,000-mile border with a wealthy country like the United States. My State of Arizona shares 377 miles of this border. I understand that Mexico must address the denationalization of State companies, curb corruption, stabilize their debt, and open up political channels for opposition parties. By continuing in their commitment to democracy, Mexico would warrant deeper and more fundamental support from the world community for reasons that go beyond momentary financial concerns. Living up to this democratic challenge can only broaden this worldwide support.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

SENATOR ERNEST F. HOLLINGS AND THE SCHOOL LUNCH PROGRAM

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I rise today to congratulate Senator ERNEST F. HOLLINGS for his continued support of the School Lunch Program. As the Orangeburg Times-Democrat of South Carolina reported on June 6, 1986, a 1-year study conducted by students from South Carolina State College has shown that free lunch programs help low-income children meet their nutritional needs. When comparing what these children eat outside of school with what the school lunch provides them, it is apparent that daily protein needs are supplemented by the school lunch program. I would like to add my support as well to this necessary and viable program.

Mr. President, I ask that the article from the Orangeburg Times-Democrat be entered in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THERE IS A FREE LUNCH—AND IT'S IMPORTANT

(By Sherri A. Clayton)

A school lunch study at Bennett Middle School reveals that low-income children are served foods meeting their nutritional needs. South Carolina State College graduate students Tom Vargo and Harriett Priester conducted a study at the school comparing protein and iron levels in children participating in the school lunch program.

The results astonished them and gave U.S. Sen. Ernest F. Hollings another leg to stand on in support of free and reduced-price lunch for the nation's public schools.

The study revealed the sample group of 78 children, ages 11 to 14, getting free lunch had less-than-normal levels of albumin, the body's most abundant protein, in their blood, children paying full price for lunch were within the recommended levels.

What this study shows is that the selection process for the free lunch program must be good. These children need it," Vargo said as he explained that school lunches provide from 53 percent to 94 percent of protein recommended for children each day.

Albumin carries antibodies that help fight diseases. Without free lunch, the children could have an increase in health problems and be absent more often from school, Vargo said.

The study also shows the food being served is meeting the children's needs, he added.

"If they didn't have the lunchroom program, many would be in trouble," Vargo said.

"These children have to eat what they're given. Their age makes them dependent on what the school and parents give them," he said.

"I went in thinking there would be no difference. But compare what is eaten outside of school," Vargo said.

Besides taking blood samples, the study surveyed the students' eating habits.

Vargo and Ms. Priester found that children on free lunch had such food as grits and soft drinks for breakfast. Most ate breakfast while having foods such as bologna, vegetables and turkey necks for an evening meal.

The children whose parents paid for lunch ate foods such as eggs, cereal and fruit for breakfast.

Protein levels are built over a period of time, Vargo said. It would take several weeks of starvation before protein began to break down in the body, he said.

"Look at the blood protein. Blood won't lie," he said.

The study revealed that black male children on free lunch had albumin within the recommended range. Females getting free lunch had levels lower than the recommended range while white males had levels significantly lower than the females.

As to the reason, Vargo could only speculate. "The white males could be taking in more carbohydrates and not enough protein to keep their albumin levels up," he said.

The study also revealed the iron levels to be within ranges found in other studies. The levels were within the recommended ranges, Ms. Priester said.

The study took about a year and a half to complete because of preliminary research, obtaining local and federal permission to do the study, getting the information from the children and processing the results.

Vargo and Ms. Priester hope to finish their graduate theses this summer.

In a search for more information, Vargo and a fellow student traveled to Washington to look for similar studies. With the help of Holling's office and the Congressional Research Service, they could not find studies similar to the one done at Bennett.

"We're excited because it (the study) really makes a case for free lunch. It's getting us away from rhetoric and showing why students need free lunch and what could happen to their health if they don't," said Dorothy Seder, a Hollings aide.

Ms. Seder said Hollings has opposed every Reagan administration proposal to cut the program since the President took office.

Hollings wrote a book, published in 1970, called "The Case Against Hunger" recounting his experience of seeing hunger and malnutrition in his hometown of Charleston, and in Columbia, just a few blocks from the Governor's Mansion.

"I hope by this book to make you believe that hunger exists in this land, that hunger poses this land, that hunger poses danger to our nation, that hunger is costing this country more in dollars than the most elaborate array of feeding programs.

"What has gone wrong? Once upon a time it was, I was hungry and you fed me.' Now it's 'I am hungry and you form a committee or call me shiftless,' " he wrote.

The 1981 Reagan Reconciliation Bill cut about 3.7 million children from the program, decreasing enrollment to 22.9 million. Five years later, enrollment is about 23.6 million, Ms. Sedar said.

The president proposed eliminating reduced-price lunches, but schools need the money to continue the programs, Ms. Seder said. Without the money from reduced- and full-price meals, some schools would not be able to continue their lunchroom programs. The children suffer, she said.

As to the future of the program, Ms. Seder said Hollings may ask Vargo and Ms. Priester to testify before Senate subcommittees next year, when the study will be used to defend the school lunch program from budget cuts.●

OMB'S INVOLVEMENT IN AGENCY RULEMAKING

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, on Monday, June 16, 1986, Senator DURENBURGER and I announced new procedures implemented by OMB to disclose OMB's involvement in agency rulemaking under Executive Orders 12291 and 12498. Notice of these new precedures was sent out by Dr. Wendy Gramm, administrator for the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs of OMB, in a memorandum to agency heads.

In order to make this document available to all Members of Congress and the public, I ask that a copy of that memorandum be placed in the RECORD at this point along with my statement made at last weeks announcement.

The memorandum and statement follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN—PRESS CONFERENCE ON OMB DISCLOSURE POLICY

I am pleased to announce a significant victory in our effort to make the regulatory process open and accountable. Our battle with the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) has been resolved. They will implement, effective today, significant new disclosure procedures for the review of rules under Executive Orders 12291 and 12498. We will withdraw our objections to the appropriations of funds for the continuation of the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs (OIRA) and will seek passage of a bill to reauthorize the office.

The procedures conform in significant ways to the bill, S. 2023, which Senator Durenburger, Senator Rudman and I introduced earlier this year and are the product of a series of recent negotiations between OMB and our offices. We believe, if faithfully executed, they will go a long way to reestablishing the public's role in the rulemaking process, which has been the intent of Congress since it passed the Administartive Procedure Act in 1947.

No longer will OMB operate within the shade-drawn, doors-closed, no-fingerprints environment in which it has operated for the past five years. From this point on, OMB's input into the rulemaking process will be a matter of public record, available for all who are so interested to see and judge.

Let me take a minute before I explain the procedures themselves to provide a brief background on just what review process these procedures address for those who may be unfamiliar with it.

On February 17, 1981, President Reagan issued Executive Order 12291, which required all covered agencies—that included all Executive Branch agencies, but not the independent regulatory agencies—to submit their proposed and final rules to OMB for review prior to publication. It directed OMB to review the rules for compliance with five cost-benefit principles layed out in the Executive Order.

The Order set a timetable for OMB review of 10 days for nonmajor rules and up to 60 days for major rules. Implicit in the Order, however, is the understanding that these timeframes are not inviolate and can be extended indefinitely by OMB. In short, OMB can, under E.O. 12291, delay the publication or implementation of a rule indefinitely if it sees fit, but arguably only if one of the standards in the Order is not met.

E.O. 12291 was followed on January 4, 1985, with E.O. 12498. This Executive Order results in more than just the rules themselves being submitted to OMB for review. It requires each rulemaking agency to clear it annual regulatory agenda with OMB so that OMB can have a key role in deciding not only how rules should look when they're issued, but which rules should be issued in the first place.

Some have called for the elimination of the OMB review process altogether. They argue that OMB has no legitimate role in reviewing many of the highly complex, unique and exhaustively developed rules agencies are required to send to OMB for review. Others, like myself and Senator Durenburger and Senator Rudman, have not reached that conclusion.

I am a supporter of the concept of executive oversight under the right conditions. I like the notion of a President who is watching the shop and that as an elected official, he is the person—allegedly acting through OMB—to whom the public can turn both for results, and for blame. And it is a legitimate way to avoid unnecessary duplication of and inconsistency in rules. Finally, it protects us from the "tunnel vision" of agency personnel that can come from being identified as the "protector" of any particular interest area. In short, the concept of executive oversight of agency rulemaking can make good management sense. And over the past five years I have stated that position on numerous occasions.

But, OMB has undermined the genuine support for the concept of executive oversight—that is an advisory, coordinating rule for the President in the rulemaking process—by persons like myself and some of my colleagues, by the strong-arm and highly secretive manner in which it has implemented the concept. It has bullied agencies who have been given the authority to issue regulations into submitting to OMB's demands, and it has trashed Congressional concerns for public participation in the rulemaking process by ignoring indications from Congress that sunshine is an essential element to the success and legitimacy of OMB review.

That is why the action taken by OMB today is, while a long time in coming, so significant. From now on we will be able to observe first-hand the extent of OMB's role in shaping regulations and the public will be able to respond to OMB's arguments and actions.

The procedures that are being put in place today are as follows.

OMB (and when I say OMB, I mean the office in OMB that reviews rules, OIRA) will disclose copies of all draft proposed and final rules sent by anyone in the rulemaking agency to OMB for review.

OMB will disclose copies of all written materials exchanged between OMB and the head of the rulemaking agency.

OMB will disclose any draft regulatory program sent to OMB for review under E.O. 12498.

OMB will make available to the public and the relevant rulemaking agency all written material received from persons outside the federal government concerning the agency's rules, a list of all meetings with persons outside the federal government and a list of all other communications—including phone calls—with persons outside the federal government pertaining to the rules of the agency. Moreover, the relevant rulemaking agency employees will be invited to attend all scheduled meetings held between OMB and persons outside the federal government. These procedures will apply to any agency requesting them.

Finally, OMB will continue to publish, as it now does, an annual accounting of the rules it reviews under E.O. 12291, including a list of the rules sent to OMB for review which were returned to the rulemaking agency and which were never published. It will also, on a monthly basis, identify those draft proposed and final rules for which OMB has completed its review during the preceding months and will state the length of OMB's review for each such rule.

The implementation of these procedures has been a long time in coming. I have been pushing for disclosure similar to this since E.O. 12291 was first issued in early 1981. In 1982 the Senate went on record with a vote of 92–0 in support of the Levin-Rudman amendment to the Regulatory Reform bill, S. 1080, which explicitly required the disclosure of draft proposed and final rules sent to OMB for review, disclosure of written material exchanged between OMB and the rulemaking agency, and a written summary of the significant changes made in the rule pursuant to OMB's involvement. OMB was on record at the time in support of that amendment. That bill, which passed the Senate, however, did not pass the House.

In the next Congress, in 1984, the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee unanimously passed a reauthorization of the Paperwork Reduction Act with an amendment by myself and Senator Rudman which would have required disclosure similar to that in the earlier regulatory reform bill. OMB said it supported that, too. But OMB never took any direct action itself to implement the disclosure procedures which it repeatedly, on the record, said it supported.

This year, after years of footdragging by OMB on the subject, Senator Durenburger, Senator Rudman and I introduced an even tougher bill, S. 2023, on the subject of disclosure. Senator Durenburger chaired an oversight hearing on OMB's involvement in agency rulemaking, and we were again treated to horror stories involving significant health and safety rules.

Well, it is my hope that these new disclosure procedures will eliminate these horror stories. The Congress and the public will know exactly the extent to which OMB affected the outcome of a rule and the basis upon which OMB argued for its position. No longer will it be a guessing game. And, the public will know whom it should be lobbying on specific issues, because it will know from which agency the criticisms of the rule are coming.

By disclosing the draft proposed and final rules which OMB reviews and by having a list of the outside parties with whom OMB has talked as well as the other aspects to these procedures which I previously mentioned, we can restore confidence in the integrity of the rulemaking process and bring the public back into the game as full and equal players.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET,
Washington, DC, June 13, 1986.

Memorandum: For the Heads of Departments and Agencies Subject to Executive Order Nos. 12291 and 12498.
From: Wendy L. Gramm, Administrator, OIRA.
Subject: Additional procedures concerning OIRA reviews under Executive Order Nos. 12291 and 12498.

From the time the President signed Executive Order No. 12291 on February 17, 1981, OMB has worked with the Departments and Agencies to develop and implement various procedures concerning the review of draft rules by the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs (OIRA). We have also developed trial procedures and supported legislative proposals concerning our reviews as we have gained experience with these Executive Orders. For example, last year, we implemented on a pilot basis with the Environmental Protection Agency additional procedures concerning OIRA's communications with persons outside the Federal Government.

We have also supported an American Bar Association Resolution that endoresed the President's regulatory review efforts and recommended that more information concerning our reviews be made available to Congress and the public.

The purpose of this memorandum is to advise you of additional procedures that we have determined, as a matter of administrative discretion, to implement concerning our review of draft rules under Executive Order. 12291 and to set forth our policy on disclosure of agency regulatory program drafts under Executive Order No. 12498.

CURRENT PROCEDURES

These new procedures supplement our current procedures. As you are aware, Executive Order No. 12291 establishes certain procedures; the Administrative Procedure Act sets forth procedural and substantive requirements that govern agency action; other statutes establish procedures; and OIRA has adopted its own internal rules concerning its review of draft rules under Executive Order No. 12291. Furthermore, Departments and Agencies usually have established rules or practices to implement their rulemaking activities.

Attached to this memorandum are copies of some of the relevant materials concerning our reviews and procedures. Several of the most important features of these current procedures are:

REVIEWS UNDER EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 12291

Rules must meet statutory requirements. Executive Order No. 12291 reviews cannot result in rules not authorized by law or rules that do not carry out statutory requirements.

Rulemaking decisions are made by agency heads. Executive Order No. 12291 makes it clear that the rulemaking authority of the agency head is not displaced by the Order.

Rules must be based on the agency record. Executive Order No. 12291 cannot cause rulemaking decisions that are not supported by the agency rulemaking record. The law requires that all agency decisions must be rationally based on information in the agency record.

Requirements of Executive Order No. 12291 apply only to the extent permitted by law. If there is a conflict between the Executive Order or the President's regulatory principles in Executive Order No. 12291 and the law, the law governs.

CURRENT OIRA PROCEDURES

Only the Administrator and Deputy Administrator within OIRA (or someone specifically designated by them) may communicate with someone who is not employed by the Federal Government on regulations submitted to OIRA for review under Executive Order No. 12291.

Written materials received from anyone not employed by the Federal Government are made available in OIRA's public reading room for review by the public.

OMB has advised persons who wish to send us information about regulatory proposals to send information to the rulemaking agency, with a copy to us, so that the material may be made a part of the agency record.

In general, OIRA provides written reasons to the agency whenever OIRA returns a regulation to an agency for further review because it is not consistent with the President's regulatory principles.

OIRA issues full reports annually on the disposition of all rules reviewed under Executive Order No. 12291, including a list of all returned rules.

NEW PROCEDURES

1. OIRA will make available, upon written request made to OIRA after publication of an ANPRM or NPRM in the Federal Register, copies of any draft of the ANPRM or NPRM submitted for OIRA's review under Executive Order No. 12291;

2. Similarly, OIRA will make available, upon written request made to OIRA after publication of the final rule in the Federal Register, copies of any draft of the final rule submitted for OIRA's review under Executive Order No. 12291;

3. OIRA will make available, upon written request made to OIRA after the ANPRM, NPRM or the final rule is published in the Federal Register, all written correspondence concerning the draft submitted for OIRA's review under Executive Order No. 12291 that is exchanged between OIRA and the agency head;

These procedures are derived from provisions in S. 2433, as reported from the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, with Administration support, in 1984. The Report on S. 2433 (No. 98-576, 98th Congress, 2d. Sess.) contains explanatory material as to how these provisions would have been interpreted had S. 2433 been enacted. We will be guided by that material in implementing these first three provisions.

4. OIRA will send EPA copies of all written material concerning EPA rules that OIRA receives from persons who are not employees of the Federal Government;

5. OIRA will advise EPA of all oral communications concerning EPA's rules, e.g., meetings, telephone calls, that OIRA (i.e., the Administrator and Deputy Administrator) has with persons who are not employees of the Federal Government; and

6. OIRA will invite EPA to all scheduled meetings with such persons concerning EPA's rules;

In May 1985, we instituted with EPA on a trial basis other procedures to better conform our Executive Order No. 12291 review procedures to EPA's somewhat unique internal procedures and statutory provisions concerning rulemaking. (See attached letter dated May 30, 1985, Attachment D). These procedures are practical, and EPA believes that they are useful. This Memorandum revises those procedures with EPA and makes them a part of OIRA's current procedures.

(Note: These procedures do not apply to information collection requests under the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1980, even if such requests are a part of a proposed agency rule. Other procedures apply to such matters, see 5 CFR Part 1320.)

7. OIRA will apply these procedures (#4 through #6) to any other Department or Agency that is subject to Executive Order No. 12291 if that agency elects to institute these procedures, or any part of them.

Procedures #4 through #6 presently apply only to EPA. Although patterned upon EPA's statutory and internal procedures nonetheless, OIRA is prepared to extend these procedures to other agencies if the head of the agency so requests.

In addition:

8. OIRA will make available upon written request to OIRA made after the Regulatory Program is published, any agency draft submission sent to OIRA under Executive Order No. 12498;

9. OIRA will continue to publish a complete annual accounting of Executive Order No. 12291 activities;

10. OIRA will make available upon written request to OIRA made after the end of a calendar month, a list of all draft ANPRMs, NPRMs and draft final rules for which OIRA has completed review under Executive Order No. 12291 during the preceding month (and the length of our review for each); and

11. OIRA will place in its public reading room: all written material received from persons outside the Federal Government concerning agency rules; a list of all meetings with persons outside the Federal Government pertaining to rules of an agency if that agency elects to participate in procedure #6; and a list of all other communications with persons outside the Federal Government pertaining to rules of any agency if that agency elects to participate in procedure #5.

These procedures do not provide for exemptions for such matters as national security information, criminal investigation information or confidential business information because we have not received such information during our reviews under Executive Order Nos. 12291 and 12498. If we do receive such information, however, that presents questions of the propriety of its release, we will discuss the matter with the Attorney General and the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee.

These new procedures and OIRA's existing procedures are intended only to improve the internal management of the Federal Government, and are not intended to create any right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law or in equity by a party against the United States, its agencies, its officers or any person.●

LITHUANIAN MELODIES PLAY ON

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I want to bring to the attention of the Senate an outstanding and commendable record of service of two of Baltimore's community leaders. For nearly 40 years, the Lithuanian community in Maryland has been served with weekly broadcasts of Lithuanian music, news, and community events on the Lithuanian Melody Hour.

Keeping the Lithuanian heritage alive in Baltimore on this leading radio program, Albert J. Juskus and J. Kestutis Laskauskas have dedicated themselves to maintaining the language, culture, and traditions that have marked the countless valuable contributions Lithuanian immigrants have made to American society. As the son of immigrants who came to this country, I know and appreciate the importance of the work of these two men and others like them who preserve the rich diversity of our many and varied cultural traditions.

Mr. President, the Baltimore Catholic Review recently reported on the efforts of these two community leaders to keep the Lithuanian heritage on the air for nearly 40 years. I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD.

LITHUANIAN MELODIES PLAY ON

(By Mary K. Tilghman)

When J. Kestutis Laskauskas arrived in Baltimore in 1949, he heard the familiar cadences of Lithuanian on the radio. "I never expected to hear it so far away from home," recalls the Lithuanian native.

He had discovered the Lithuanian Melody Time, a weekly ethnic program organized by two Lithuanian-Americans from St. Alphonsus Parish.

And, when one of the two founders left the program, he joined the two-man staff with Albert J. Juskus.

The Lithuanian Melody Time got its start Jan. 11, 1948 on WBMD-AM and is now the longest continuous-running ethnic radio show in Baltimore.

"We never missed a Sunday in 39 years," Laskauskas says with pride.

Joe Ruzga's mother heard an anniversary announced on a Lithuanian show in New Jersey and suggested Baltimore needed such a show. The Western Electric engineer and Juskus got together to work on the Lithuanian Melody Time on a brand new station, WBMD.

"We did it more or less to preserve the language," said Juskus, whose parents emigrated from Lithuania. His knowledge of the language his parents taught him was fading.

Since then the format has never varied. Lithuanian music—everything from opera arias to tender patriotic songs about an independent Lithuania—fills most of the time. Announcements about events, birthdays, anniversaries and even funerals are presented both in Lithuanian and English.

That half hour always takes people—both Lithuanian natives and second or third generation Americans—back to the old country, even if it's just for a short time.

"I know people who are waiting from Sunday to Sunday to hear something in the Lithuanian language," Laskauskas said, his own speech lightly accented.

Both announcers have their own collections of music which play on the air.

Their collections are carefully guarded—they went to a lot of trouble to collect those albums. Juskus has visited Lithuania six times, always bringing back stacks of albums his cousins have purchased since his last visit. The Soviet Union forbids its citizens from mailing tapes or albums.

Their collection also includes performances done locally—some as far back as the 1950s. Every once in a while we play one back and excite someone." said Juskus, who retired after 30 years with the Baltimore City Fire Department.

On June 15, broadcast time changed from 3:15 p.m. to 10:30 a.m. with 15 minutes cut from the show. Despite the shorter show, the change in time will be warmly welcomed, according to Laskauskas.

And it will continue to do what the Lithuanian Melody Hour is supposed to do—keep the Lithuanian heritage alive in Baltimore.●

A MILLION GRADUATES

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, our colleagues from many States will be pleased to note that sometime during this traditional season of graduations, the 28 colleges and universities operated by the Jesuits in the United States have graduated their one-millionth living alumnus. Contributing to this extraordinary accomplishment is Loyola College in Baltimore, one of Maryland's leading institutions of higher education.

It has always been my firm conviction that there is no greater endeavor than the education of our young people. Offering the opportunity for a true education and developing the potential for success in this increasingly complex world are two of the most important tasks in a democratic society. I want to express my own appreciation for the leadership and initiative of the many teachers and administrators at the Jesuit institutions, and expecially Baltimore's Loyola College for their outstanding contributions.

Mr. President, Father Joseph A. Sobierajski, assistant dean of arts and sciences and rector of the Jesuit community at Loyola College has written an outstanding article about the important role these 1 million graduates have played in our society and the founding that the Jesuit institutions have given these men and women.

Father Joseph makes many important observations in his article, but one struck me as especially noteworthy:

Concern for the individual has always been primary in Jesuit education, but the aim of that concern is to graduate a person who can make an impact on society, a person with credible academic and professional qualifications and one rich with concern and compassion for others, one whose life is not self-centered but other-centered.

Mr. President, I know our colleagues join me in saluting the Jesuits on the accomplishments of their colleges and universities, on the dedication of those who teach and administer and most of all on the contributions of their graduates.

I ask that Father Joseph's article, which appeared in the Baltimore Sun, be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[FROM THE BALTIMORE SUN, MAY 31, 1986]

A MILLION GRADUATES

(By Joseph A. Sobierajski)

During this 1986 graduation season the 28 Jesuit colleges and universities in the United States will graduate their one millionth living alumnus. That is an extraordinary accomplishment, but equally extraordinary is this system of colleges which span the country from Loyola College to Boston College, to Georgetown University to St. Louis University, to Creighton University to Gonzaga University to Loyola-Marymount with 21 others scattered in between linked by the philosophy of education that purports to do something essentially different with and for the students who come to them for an education.

The purpose of Jesuit education is rooted in the experience of St. Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the Society of Jesus. His "Spiritual Exercises" are the distillation of that experience, and they are the cornerstone of Jesuit education. Appropriately enough for the Sixteenth Century, the Principle and Foundation of the "Exercises" acknowledge God's love as the creative source and the goal of all reality. The experience of the "Exercises" leads the individual to an understanding of God's unique love for him and calls forth a response in kind.

Love, Ignatius says, is found in deeds much more than in words. One who loves, therefore, gives to the beloved what he has no matter what it may be. So too is our response to God's love. When we realize God's great love for us, our response is to give what we have, ourselves, with the talents, abilities, and qualities that make us unique. This is, of course, fine for a 16th-century mystic, but what does it have to do with education, especially higher education in the latter part of the Twentieth Century?

Jesuit education means to parallel the experience of the "Exercises." Gerard Manley Hopkins, the 19th century Jesuit poet, wrote, "The world is charged with the grandeur of God." The liberal-arts approach of Jesuit education presumes the world to be good. It aims not only at the discovery of that world by its students, but also at the discovery of God's grandeur through the things of the world. Education is in a very real sense a religious experience: whether its subject matter be quantum mechanics, Chaucer, or software engineering, it reveals something of the magnificence of a Creator who shares himself in the world he has made.

Jesuit education acknowledges the duality of a human being as body and soul, thereby demanding a growth in virtue as well as knowledge. Moral development is the partner of intellectual development, for without virtue, knowledge can be both dangerous and threatening. An education which stresses ethical and moral principles can lead students to make proper choices in the use of knowledge and to admit the responsibility for their acts and decisions as well as the interdependence of all men and women.

Jesuit education focuses not only on individuals and their intellectual and moral development, but also on the individual as a creative force in society. Concern for the individual has always been primary in Jesuit education, but the aim of that concern is to graduate a person who can make an impact on society, a person with credible academic and professional qualifications and one rich with concern and compassion for others, one whose life is not self-centered but other-centered. To be such a person is to acknowledge as Ignatius of Loyola did the overwhelming love of God and to respond by the giving of self and goods of others.

This program that Jesuit education lays out for itself is an awesome one. While it seeks the same excellence in the pursuit of knowledge that the best higher-education institutions seek, it is also strongly countercultural in its stress of the spiritual, moral and transcendent. One can well imagine that it is not an education to which all students would readily assent, even all of those enrolled in Jesuit institutions. Every student who does, however, is a unique asset to our society. The contributions such men and women can make and have made to public life as physicians, lawyers, teachers, businessmen and everyday citizens are invaluable for the continued health of our nation.

One million living alumni! We have no way of knowing how many of them have responded to the challenge of their education, but the number must be significant. Of those million alumni, Loyola College claims 26,000, and of those, 17,000 are citizens of Maryland. They sit as judges in our courts, save lives in our hospitals, minister to the poor and needy, educate the young, run our financial institutions and raise their families guided by the ideals of their education.

Father Joseph, S.J., is assistant dean of arts and sciences and rector of the Jesuit community at Loyola College.●

THE RURAL ELECTRIC COOPERATIVES

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, the Oklahoma Association of Electric Cooperatives brings a group of outstanding young people from our great State to Washington each year. The young people are selected for this trip to our Nation's Capitol through essay contests conducted by the various electric cooperatives in Oklahoma. A highlight of the Washington visit each year is a breakfast in the Capitol where the essay winners dine with members of the Oklahoma congressional delegation. One member of the group is selected to read his or her winning essay at the breakfast meeting.

This year, Ms. Traci Bridges of Skiatook, OK, a winner in the contest conducted by the Verdigris Valley Electric Cooperative with headquarters at Collinsville, OK, was selected to read her essay entitled "Snow White and the REC." I want to share that essay with my colleagues in the U.S. Senate today:

I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The essay follows:

SNOW WHITE AND THE REC

Once upon a time, a girl named Snow White lived in a comfortable apartment in the city. She loved her total electric kitchen, and the way her apartment stayed cozy and warm in the winter and cool in the summer. She had leisure hours to read, watch television, cook and she enjoyed watching the city lights from her tenth-floor window.

Little did she know that soon her fairy-tale lifestyle would change. Across town her electric company's meter reader, Wylie Kilowatt, was talking to his computer. He said, "Computer, computer in the hall, who has the largest bill of all?" The computer replied:

"I must confess, Snow White's meter is a mess, her apartment building was built, you see, back in 1923. The windows leak, the insulation is weak, the heating unit could make you 'freak', the air-conditioner wastes energy, but that's great for you and me. We'll raise her rates, her bill will be more than she anticipates, but that's all fine, don't you see, it means more income for you and me."

When Snow received the bill she was horrified! She wrote the computer explaining her dilemma. The computer called Wylie Kilowatt instructing him to disconnect Snow's electricity and bring back a copy of the disconnect order as proof he had followed instructions.

Upon Snow's return home that evening, the elevator wasn't working. She climbed ten flights of stairs only to find her apartment dark and cold. She was so horrified that she fled to the country.

She found a small cottage in the edge of the forrest which looked deserted. When she went inside she found the sink full of dishes, everything covered with dust, and dirty clothes everywhere. In one room there were seven little beds. Carved on each bed was a name, they read: "Sneezy", "Sleepy", "Grumpy", "Happy", "Doc", "Dopey", and "Bashful". Seeing the beds, Snow realized how tried she was and fell fast asleep across all seven beds.

Meanwhile, the little men who lived in the cottage were on their way home. Sneezy was a farmer and grew vegetables. Happy, a dairyman, milked cows and sold the milk door to door. He wasn't really happy but door-to-door salesman must "act" happy. Doc, an inventor, was frustrated. When darkness fell, he had to leave his inventions—even if he was near a breakthrough. Sleepy, who was never able to sleep because it was always too cold or too warm, was unemployed. Grumpy worked in his gold mine. He rarely found gold, but always came home covered in black dust. Dopey, an architect and builder who spent his days building houses, always reserved a few hours of daylight to work on his designs. But, there was never enough time to cultivate his many ideas. Bashful, like Sleepy, was unemployed and looked for work each day.

They were very surprised to find Snow White in their cottage. Soon, Snow learned that they were kind and when they learned of her experience in the city, they told her that she could stay.

The next morning after the little men left, Snow could not find the dishwasher. So, she drew water, chopped wood, built a fire, heated the water, washed, rinsed, and dried the dishes. There was no vacuum cleaner. She had to sweep, sweep, sweep. Next, the laundry. (OH NO! More Hot Water!) She scrubbed, rinsed, and hung the clothes to dry. Now it was time to cook dinner. With no refrigerator, she had to kill, clean, pluck, cut up, and cook a chicken. To her horror, she needed more hot water and a hot fire to cook.

When the little men came home, they washed up (which means more water to draw) and ate dinner. Now Snow had more dishes to wash—it was chop, stack, heat, wash, rinse, and dry. Now it was dark, too dark to read. Her manicure was ruined, her hair was a mess, and her muscles ached. She had no leisure time at all. She was ready to return to the city and face Wylie Kilowatt when she remembered reading about the Rural Electric Cooperative (REC).

The next morning when she vitited the REC office, she was relieved to learn that by using REC, they would be part owners and by cooperating with neighbors, who were also part owners, they could keep rates low. Today with help from REC. . . .

Sneezy is not sneezy. Using irrigation, he plants a larger acreage. Cool storage facilities keep vegetables fresh longer, now he quick freezes and packages them for future use. An air-cleaning device on his heat pump has eliminated his allergies.

Happy's efficient, sanitary, large-scale dairy is very successful. REC helped reduce manual labor, allowing him to increase his operation. He supplied local stores with fresh milk. His knuckles have healed, and his feet are well. Happy is really happy.

Doc is no longer frustrated. Electric lights, calculators, and computers have given him time to use his creative mind. To conserve fossil fuel, he looked for more effective fuels. He invented a wind energy device which revolutionized that field. His system of wind turbines in combination with a power tower use both wind and solar energy with dramatic results. He is working with wave energy conversion, ocean thermal conversion, hydroelectric power, and further studies into solar power.

Sleepy's new climate controlled home allows him to rest at night. He is now a productive employee of the REC. He is conducting energy audits, installing lines, and checking sub stations. His maintenance-type duties and continuous working efforts have practically eliminated power outages.

Grumpy is now a pleasant coal miner operator. He discovered subbituminous coal, usually found only in North Dakota, Montana, and Texas, but this is a fairy tale and anything is possible in fairy tales, so he found subbituminous coal in Oklahoma, which he sold to the REC to produce efficient low-cost electricity. He named his mine "Grumpy's Famous Fossel Fuel Facility".

Dopey is a very successful architect and builder. His energy efficient designs are now famous. He has hired Bashful as his assistant, and they can never call him "Dopey" again.

At the and of the year, the REC had saved so much money through peak-load devices, Grumpy's coal, and Doc's new inventions that they had money left after expenses. The non-profit REC paid all it's members a rebate.

Since the seven little men had built their own homes, Snow was all alone in the cottage. She called the REC for an energy audit. A few replacement windows and some new insulation fixed the cottage up.

One day Wylie Kilowatt showed up at Snow's door disguised as a traveling salesman, she recognized him at once. She paid the money she owed him with her rebate check, sang him a lullaby, sent him on his way, fell in love with the REC director, married him, and lived happily ever after.●

IMPACT OF CHERNOBYL NUCLEAR ACCIDENT

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, it has been almost 2 months since the nuclear accident at Chernobyl. In human terms, this accident has been a terrible tragedy. At least 26 individuals have already died, others are critically ill and nearly 100,000 have been evacuated from their homes. For some, it is unclear when they will be able to return to their homes, if ever.

Now, we are starting to receive analyses from researchers who have used available radiation data to calculate the long-term impacts of this accident, and they underscore its severity.

Estimates of fatal and nonfatal cancers which will be caused from this accident range from the tens of thousands to the hundreds of thousands.

In fact, Dr. John Gofman, professor emeritus of medical physics at the University of California at Berkeley, who has had illustrious careers in the fields of medicine and nuclear energy, has calculated that on the basis of currently available data, Chernobyl will result in 357,655 fatal and nonfatal cancers, and 14,710 cases of leukemia. This would make Chernobyl the largest industrial accident in the history of mankind. Dr. Gofman's findings were reported in a paper presented to the environmental Congress and Fair in Wurzburg, West Germany.

Mr. President, I will ask that this paper be included in the RECORD.

Dr. Gofman cautions that the true impacts could be much higher, because some radiation data is incomplete or unavailable.

Dr. Gofman's work underscores the serious impacts that radiation from a nuclear accident can have on a population over time. It shows that we must redouble efforts to ensure that our nuclear facilities are absolutely safe and that oversight agencies give the highest priority to safety.

There may be some who claim Dr. Gofman's estimates are too high. That may or may not be so, but Dr. Gofman's reputation in the field is an excellent one. If there is uncertainty, it only underscores the need for more independent research.

The fact of the matter is that throughout the history of this Nation's development of nuclear energy—for weapons and for electricity—there has been a tendency to underestimate and downplay the impact of radiation on public health. This is particularly true for the Department of Energy and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. Despite this, there is a growing consensus that there may be no safe threshold for radiation.

Unfortunately, most of the work in this area is funded and controlled by private and governmental interests with a stake in quieting public concerns about radiation health effects.

This issue was eloquently addressed in a recent editorial in U.S. News and World Report by Harold Evans, the editorial director of that publication.

I will also ask that Mr. Evans' editorial be included in the RECORD.

Mr. President, Chernobyl holds many lessons for us if we will only attempt to learn them.

It is imperative that we realize that a serious nuclear accident can happen, and place more emphasis on safety and emergency planning.

It is also imperative that we support more objective and independent research in the area of radiation effects.

The public has a right to know what risks it faces. It also has a right to expect that we in the Government will do all we can to protect them from those risks.

I now ask that the aforementioned documents be printed in the RECORD.

The documents follow.

CHERNOBYL: THE GREATEST INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT IN MANKIND'S HISTORY

(By John W. Gofman, M.D., Ph.D., Professor Emeritus, Medical Physics, University of California at Berkeley)

While a great deal of attention has been riveted upon the occurrence of acute radiation poisoning, including deaths thereof, from the Chernobyl accident, by far the greater toll of human life taken will be in the form of cancers and leukemias. No honest scientist today will claim there is any safe threshold dose for radiation-induced cancer or leukemia. The extensive epidemiological evidence makes it clear that cancer and leukemia occur in direct proportion to the doses received by members of any irradiated population. Indeed much of the evidence shows that each unit of radiation exposure contributes more to cancer and leukemia induction at low total doses than does each unit of exposure at high total doses.

The requirements for Estimation of the Cancer and Leukemia Toll from the Chernobyl Accident:

Radiation-induced cancer and leukemia will occur either with exposure of the total body to ionizing radiation or with exposure of parts of the body to ionizing radiation. It is self-evident that total body exposure yields more cancers per unit doses than does partial body exposure for that same doses in rads. We shall use the rad and millirad units here, since virtually all the relevant issues for Chernobyl would show that the rad and rem are equivalent (and the millirad and millirem are equivalent. The overwhelming evidence indicates that the total exposure (at any particular age) is the dominant consideration, rather than the exposure rate, for induction of cancer or leukemia. No protection is to be counted on for distributing the does over time.

If we know the integrated total body doses received, in rads or millirads, per person, and if we know the population of any country whose residents received this average doses per person, we can immediately assess the toll of cancer and leukemia to be expected for that country.

For a population of mixed ages (including all the children and adults), we use a measurement known as the accumulated person-millirads received to the whole body. Thus if the average dose is 100 millirads, and the population is 10,000,000, we would say:

Person-millirads=(10,000,000 persons) x (100 millirads)=1,000,000,000 person-millirads.

From extensive epidemiological studies of cancer induction in various human populations, I have presented a set of numbers for what we call the Whole-Body Cancer Dose. That is the dose in person-millirads which will guarantee one fatal cancer. In Radiation and Human Health (Sierra Club Books, 1981, Hardcover Edition) I have presented the values of the Whole-Body Cancer Dose for males and females of all ages, and of a mixed population of all ages and both sexes.

For our considerations here of Chernobyl, it is the Whole-Body Cancer Dose for a population of mixed ages that we will use extensively. That value is 268,000 person-millirads, and the delivery of that dose to a population will guarantee one fatal cancer in that population. And because the incidence of cancer is approximately Twice the mortality rate, we can add one additional non-fatal cancer from that dose delivered. There is no requirement that each individual receive the same dose. We simply need the weighted average dose for the population and then multiply it by the population size to get the person-millirads, as in the definition above. Using that hypothetical population of 10,000,000 persons above, and its receipt of 1,000,000,000 person-millirads, we would calculate the number of cancers as follows:

Fatal Cancers=1,000,000,000 person-millirads÷268,000 person-millirads per cancer =3,730 fatal cancers plus 3,730 non-fatal cancers. Total Cancers =7,460 for that radiation dose to the population.

Clearly to provide the cancer toll for Chernobyl, we need the average total body dose received in each country affected (which is all of Europe, Scandinavia, and the Soviet Union, at least) and the population of the country. Let us turn to this issue.

The Country-by-country Doses Received from the Chernobyl Accident:

It is regrettable, and really a major disgrace, that even 30 days after the accident, many of the data concerning dosage received by various populations are either fragmentary or non-available. But sufficient data do exist (WHO [1] sources, U.S. EPA [2]) to enable us to estimate at least the minimum number of fatal and non-fatal cancers and the minimum number of leukemia cases—all from the Chernobyl accident. When more data become available, the true number of fatalities and non-fatal cancers is certain to be considerably greater than that estimated in this report, unless WHO and EPA have some errors on the high side.

The Sources of Radiation We Must Consider:

(1) Direct radiation of the whole body from gamma rays in the cloud of radiation passing over a population.

(2) Inhalation of radioactive substances from the passing cloud and radioactive substances re-suspended after deposition on the ground.

(3) Direct radiation of the whole body from gamma rays emitted from radionuclides deposited on the ground.

(4) Ingestion of radionuclides (from milk, water, meat, fruits, vegetables.)

We can state at the outset that all the requisite measurements for a complete assessment are far from available. But for most populations we can estimate a minimum whole body dose, depending upon which of the items listed above have been measured. We can be sure that a very high dose must have been received by some of the populations from the early passing cloud, when the short-lived radioisotopes were abundant. In fact, the missing of this radiation-source and its cancer consequences can make a tragedy appear not to be too serious. But Chernobyl is the greatest human industrial tragedy, even with the minimum estimates of its health consequences.

The Available Data for Estimation of Doses:

The WHO or the U.S. EPA may provide estimates for the total population averages or they may provide data for doses received at certain specified locations in various countries. The population average whole-body dose is the one to be desired, but when it is not available to us, we shall use the following set of rules to estimate doses.

If only one location has been measured in a country, we shall assume half the country received that dose and half the country received zero dose. This is a cautious procedure which avoids overcrediting the dose from a region which might not be representative—as for example, a region of heavy rainfall with a large washout of the radioactive material and its deposition on the ground.

If two or more locations have been measured in a country, we shall use the average of the measurements for dose.

In some areas there are measurements which enable us to know the deposition of cesium-137 on the ground, and aside from being in the early passing cloud, this will be the dominant source of whole-body radiation. And we know how to convert the data for cesium-137 on the ground to the integrated total body dose over time, including both external dose and that from ingestion. (See Radiation and Human Health, Hardcover Edition, p. 548)

In some areas such cesium-137 measurements cannot be estimated, and we shall have to rely on whatever other measurements have been provided us. For countries where no data are available we may have to leave estimates to be added later when and if data become available. Where a country has reported to WHO that the average dose is some value, we shall use that average dose, in the absence of the specific data from which we estimate the dose ourselves.

It is not the purpose of this report to present the extensive calculations which we use to convert the reported data to final estimates of average dose to each population. That will be presented in a much more detailed paper in the early future. (We can consider such a later paper as "Part 2" of this report.)

Our current estimate of the best value for minimum dose received by an "average" person in each country plus the cancer fatalities and additional non-fatal cancers caused by such doses are all presented in Table 1, which follows. In the preface to Table 1, there is a major caveat concerning accuracy of doses reported to us by WHO and EPA.

LEUKEMIA ESTIMATES

Leukemia is estimated separately from other cancers using a mixed-age population leukemia dose of 6,500,000 person-millirads (See See X-Rays: Health Effects of Common Exams, Sierra Club Books, 1985). Leukemias are especially important because they cause larger loss of life span per case, by far, than does cancer.

A PREFACE TO THE READER USING DATA IN TABLE 1

The source of all dose estimates in the following table derive from information in either WHO documents or U.S. EPA documents:

The WHO document is "Updated Summaries of Data Received in Europe Re Chernobyl Reactor Accident", dated 30 May, 1986. Sent by Mr. J.I. Waddington to Mr. Mike Mardis, U.S. E.P.A. The EPA Documents are a series dated, May 8, May 9, May 12, and May 14, 1986 entitled "Chernobyl Radiation Data Summary" United States Environmental Protection Agency.

The author of this paper (and Table 1) can in no way vouch for the goodness of the numbers provided to him in the WHO or EPA reports. Some of those numbers are truly suspect, because of inconsistencies. But it is not science to pick and choose the numbers one might like to throw away. Either an independent source must go over all the entries or none at all, for otherwise this becomes managed science.

The reader will note the astounding values for dose in Finland, Sweden, and United Kingdom. These doses necessarily lead to a high number of cancer fatalities calculated. The doses may be correct as they stand; they may not be correct. But scientifically no one has a right to eliminate these doses simply because they give rise to high cancer estimates. So, remember we are at the mercy of the reporting sources and any errors they may introduce.

The author expects in Part 2 of this report (to follow soon) to test a method of cancer calculation which does not depend on these reporting sources. However, it is always desirable in the extreme to have reality checks for any model which attempts to describe the accident's consequences.

The reader will note the lack of calculations for most of the Soviet Union. Only the most fragmentary data were provided to WHO, via the I.A.E.A.[3] I even hesitated to put the Ukraine value in the table, because the dose data are so woefully inadequate. As an absolute minimum for cancers produced, it provides some glimmer of the problem within the Soviet Union.

[2] There is not a single measurement yet provided by the World Health Organization or EPA for East Germany.

Note: The WHO Report indicates that many data additional to those in the report have been made available to them, but there was not time to assemble it all. Particularly is this commented upon for the United Kingdom data. Obviously, if an unbiased update of doses, which allow a more complete picture for various regions of a country, is provided, the cancer calculations presented here are subject to serious revisions. I would emphasize an unbiased update of data, since countries sponsoring nuclear power may be prone to favor low-doses being reported to maintain some residual public support for their nuclear power programs.

LET'S FACE IT, WE GOOFED

(By Harold Evans)

Nobody can escape Chernobyl. Even as Mikhail Gorbachev made his lamentably late public statement 18 days after the disaster, his radioactive rain was falling on the United States. Low levels of the dangerous iodine 131 were turning up in milk in Western states.

The findings were accompanied, as usual, by official statements that there is nothing to worry about. But there is. There may be no cause for immediate alarm, but there is durable cause for skepticism because the history of radiation is a history of assurances falsified by time. Chernobyl will yield some benefit if it forces everyone to confront that issue squarely and, of course, soberly. Gorbachev was disingenuous when he denied that the Soviets had delayed warning their neighbors, but unhappily he was able to find refuge in criticism of sensationalism in the Western media. Headlines such as the New York Post's "15,000 Buried in Mass Grave" are not merely wild; they divert attention from the more insidious issue of the effects of radiation over long periods.

The mortal words on the subject of the risks from fallout were uttered not by Gorbachev but by Dr. Bill Burr, deputy director at the Energy Research and Development Administration's division of biomedical and environmental research in June, 1977: "Let's face it, the U.S. goofed." Dr. Burr was commenting on the prevalence of thyroid cancer in natives of the Marshall Islands 23 years after the U.S. bomb tests. The theory when we set off the bombs was that islanders received only low-level radiation so that a detailed follow-up was not necessary.

It was wrong. That was not an aberration. From Hiroshima on, most of the statements on radiation, mainly by physicists on corporate and government grants, have been proven blindly optimistic. We were told no one was at risk from small doses of radiation below a certain safety "threshold." In 1980, an expert panel of the National Academy of Sciences confirmed what the biologists had long been saying: There is no such threshold. Every increment of radiation increases the risk of a cancer or of genetic damage for succeding generations.

Clearly, some risks have to be taken for the benefit of medical diagnosis, but the concept of the threshold was less concerned with X-rays than with calming public anxiety about involuntary radiation from weapons fallout and nuclear power and resisting compensation claims from Army veterans, power-plant workers and the citizen victims living downwind of the Nevada test site. And despite the effective rebuttal of the threshold, we are even now fed pablum about "acceptable" levels of radiation. Acceptable to whom?

The answer is that they are acceptable to successive bureaucracies in all the nuclear powers that have fought hard to keep the truth from the people. The Department of Energy cut off a long-term research contract with Dr. Thomas Mancuso of the University of Pittsburgh when in 1975 he started coming up with findings linking cancer deaths at the government's Hanford, Wash., plant with exposure to low-level radiation. Dr. Robert Pendleton of the University of Utah was cut off when he began to finger high radiation from underground testing in 1974. Crucial medical records were destroyed at Oak Ridge, Tenn. And only last month, the Department of Energy tried to conceal yet another release of radiation from the Nevada test site.

That this nuclear testing is obnoxious and unnecessary, as I believe, is a proposition that some would debate. But who can defend the absurdity that most of the money for radiation-health-effects research comes from the Department of Energy, which has a vested interest in nuclear power and weapons testing? And why should military nuclear stations escape the scrutiny of the already limp Nuclear Regulatory Commission?

Einstein warned that we had unleashed a malevolent genie. Would that it could be speedily bottled up again. But the end of this century, all the peoples of the world may be exposed to twice the level of radiation from natural sources. Between 1971 and 1984, there were 151 significant nuclear-safety incidents in 14 countries. We cannot afford any more accidents. We ought not to tolerate the specious glosses on our predicament. They are nothing less than a betrayal of mankind.●

CALL TO CONSCIENCE: THE CASE OF THE APEKIN FAMILY

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I rise today to speak on behalf of the Apekin family of Moscow. Since 1979, they have suffered for trying to exercise their right to emigrate to Israel, as granted under the Helsinki accords.

The Apekin's tragic story mirrors those of thousands of other Soviet Jews. Vladimir, his wife Ekaterina, their daughter and grandaughter are "refuseniks." Since they were officially denied permission to leave the Soviet Union, both Vladimir and Ekaterina have lost their jobs, been subject to officially sanctioned harassment, and been denied needed medical care.

The Apekin's story is made more tragic by the fact that a visa would not only grant the Apekins freedom; it also might save Vladimir from losing his legs. Mr. Apekin suffers from an ischemic heart condition that daily denies his legs life-giving blood flow. Sadly, Vladimir has been repeatedly denied space in a hospital where he might receive proper medical treatment.

Recently, after cosigning a statement of intent to stage a peaceful demonstration with three other refusenik families, hospital space miraculously became available. However, because of the aggravated state of the disease, the Soviet prognosis is double amputation. Here in the West an alternative treatment exists.

The Apekins have paid the 2,100 rubles required to renounce their Soviet citizenship. They have consistently filed all required paperwork. Nothing should stand in the way of their emigration. Unfortunately, it is not a fair or even rational system which will decide the fate of this family; it is the arbitrary and unjust Soviet bureaucracy to which they and we must appeal. Currently, Vladimir's daughter is staging a hunger strike to draw attention to her family's situation.

Mr. President, today I make a special appeal to those who hold the strings of power in Moscow. On behalf of the Apekins, the Meimans, the Bogomolnies, Yuli Edelstein, Ida Nudel, Josef Berenstein, and the many others for whom a visa might mean a prolonged or healthier life, I ask the Soviet leadership to give prompt attention to these cases. The lives of these brave people depend on it.●

NATIONAL DAIRY MONTH

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, it may come as a surprise to some of my colleagues in the Senate that the dairy industry is an important part of agribusiness in Oklahoma.

According to the latest statistics from our State department of agriculture, milk and cream production is the third largest agriculture commodity in the State. We have 107,000 dairy cattle and 6,000 dairy farms producing more than a million pounds of milk and cream annually.

This month dairy farmers across the country are observing the 50th anniversary of June Dairy Month, and I want to congratulate those in Oklahoma and the other States on this occasion.

I want to share with my colleagues the remarks of Ivan K. Strickler, Chairman of the Board of the National Dairy Promotion and Research Board, before the national holstein convention. I will ask that his remarks be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The National Dairy Board was created by Congress in 1983 primarily as a maketing promotion effort to encourage greater consumption of dairy products by the American public. In the first 2 years of the Board's operations the results have been encouraging, and this is the essence of Mr. Strickler's comments to the holstein convention.

I am encouraged that this program is working, and extend my best wishes to all dairy farmers everywhere for continued success.

I ask that the remarks of Mr. Strickler be printed in the RECORD.

The remarks follows:

REMARKS OF IVAN K. STRICKLER

INTRODUCTION

NATIONAL DAIRY BOARD UPDATE: ACCOMPLISHMENTS

Last month, the National Dairy Board held its second Annual meeting in Arlington, VA. In the course of three days of intensive meetings, Board members reviewed the progress of the National Promotion and Research efforts during the past year.

It was clear to us at that time the program had came a long way in the short space of 24 months. It was clear that we had a great deal of work ahead of us. I know I speak for everyone of our 36 Board members when I say that we are eager to continue our efforts to improve the bottom-line perspective for the entire dairy industry.

Today, I'd like to present to you some of the highlights of the Board's activities and accomplishments during its second year of existence.

Before I get into the program areas, I'm going to talk briefly about a subject that is probably uppermost on the mind of everyone in this room—finance. As dairy farmers, you are providing the vital link for the Board's life support system—the promotion funding. Therefore, you have a right to know how well the Board is administering the funds entrusted to it.

I am extremely pleased to report that two recent audits have been quite complimentary to the Board in the handling of its funds.

The Office of the Inspector General of the U.S.D.A. recently completed an audit of the entire dairy promotion program. In the report that will be published sometime in June or July, the National Dairy Board, the qualified promotion programs and the U.S.D.A. will be examined separately.

In a preliminary exit interview, we were informed of the auditors' conclusions about the Board's financial procedures. The auditors found no reason to recommend improvements in controls and procedures. In fact, they went so far as to compliment the Board on its collections and compliance system.

I have been told this is a very unusual response by the Office of the Inspector General and I am very impressed that our financial program is so well regarded.

In addition, Peat, Marwick and Mitchell recently completed the Board's regularly-scheduled annual audit. Traditionally, this year-end review would provide the opportunity for auditors' recommendations for improvements in procedures and controls. However, these financial experts also gave the Board a clean bill of health.

In the Board's program areas, many exciting initiatives were launched during the course of the past year.

ADVERTISING

As you know, our biggest financial commitment is in the area of advertising.

This year, the Board broke new ground in the development of a program to test market new promotional campaigns before their national release. The procedure makes good business sense, particularly in terms of the large sums of money involved. Like other major advertisers, we will test market our programs and go back to the drawing board if we find the plans are not meeting our objectives.

EVALUATION

We are working to expand the information base to make our evaluation program the best possible of its kind. Three econometric research programs are under way at four land grant universities. Ron Ward of the University of Florida and Bruce Dixon of the University of Arkansas are working on a fluid milk model. Stan Johnson and Helen Jensen at Iowa State University are evaluating the Board's calcium program and the effectiveness of calcium advertising. And, Olan Forker and Don Liu at Cornell University are working on possible improvements in the database for dairy econometrics and market research.

This is only the beginning of this effort. Additional projects on cheese, butter and ice cream have been targeted, once the database is adequate.

NUTRITION EDUCATION EVALUATION

The Board has extended its evaluation efforts into a new area this year, as it examines the effectiveness of its nutrition education program. An independent study on health professional advertising has provided same positive results about the dairy message.

The first wave of the study showed that the health professional groups the Board has been advertising to the longest are the most favorable about the use of dairy products for osteoporosis and bone disease problems. This is a strong indication that our advertising campaigns have been effective in changing the opinions of these groups toward dairy products.

The Board's independent study results have been supported by a third party study conducted for Grey Medical Advertising. The results of this study parallel the Board's findings and even tend to be a bit more positive—which might be expected from an advertising agency.

PUBLIC RELATIONS

In the first year, the Board concentrated its public relations efforts on informing the nation's dairy farmers about the extent of its activities. This year, the program had been expanded to reach consumers nationwide through a variety of efforts.

We began with osteoporosis and were very successful with the airing of television public service announcements. A total of 68 p.s.a.s featuring Members of Congress offering a brochure on the bone disease resulted in the distribution of more than 25,000 brochures.

We have been conducting media training sessions for selected researchers conducting Board-funded projects. This will help the researchers get the scientific message to the consumer in a clear fashion through the media.

And, most recently, we have begun to take advantage of our expanded position as a media resource with the release of information on the significant increase in dairy product consumption during the past two years.

PRODUCT RESEARCH

In its first year, the Board funded 19 product research projects. This year, the effort in this area has increased significantly.

During the past 12 months, we have in place more than 40 product research projects and one workshop on research opportunities for the dairy foods industry.

The areas under study include: improved flavor for lowfat dairy products and the development of dairy products for lactose intolerant individuals.

NUTRITION RESEARCH

In the area of nutrition research, the Board has begun to increase funding for research projects that ultimately will be helpful in its promotion efforts. I have brought a brief film with me to describe our efforts in this area.

Since its inception, the Board placed 80 percent of its budget into advertising efforts designed to move products quickly. Most of our Board members realize that a long term view is important and have begun to shift program funding accordingly.

Currently, of the 83 research projects funded by the dairy industry, 51 are funded by the National Dairy Board. This is a 20 percent increase from 1985. In addition, 1987 budget projections allocate an even greater percentage of funds to this effort.

Nutrition research has a longer life span than the results of commercial advertising. We know that education and research programs pay off, although they take a longer time to develop results. Once the results are available, this information can encourage consumers to modify their eating habits and our promotion efforts can have a longer lasting impact.

An additional new venture in the area of nutrition research is the development of the Board's Industry Review Committee. We hope this committee will provide direction in the establishment of industry priorities to develop the best possible nutrition research program for the dairy industry.

FUTURE

Obviously, we have built up a great deal of momentum in the past 24 months and I am certain this will continue to build in the year ahead.

ADVERTISING

We have begun to lay the groundwork for new advertising and promotion plans.

The first of these plans involves strengthening our communications on fluid milk to young people between the ages of 10 and 16. Work is under way now to develop a test program to see if special advertising messages geared to this group will generate more total milk sales.

A second avenue is the exploration of the combined effect of consumer couponing, along with advertising as a way to generate increased butter sales. We plan to test this in a limited number of markets in the coming year.

A third area of new development is a reconsideration of the best way to encourage to eat more cheese. Several alternative campaigns to focus more directly on the reasons to buy cheese than current advertising are under review. The best of these approaches also will be tested in a limited number of markets in the coming year.

In addition, we will continue to monitor all of our current on-going campaigns and recommend ways to strengthen and refine those efforts in the coming months.

All of these programs reflect the Board's commitment to constantly develop new programs for better ways of selling dairy products.

DAIRY RESEARCH

The Board is working to revitalize the dairy studies structure with the establishment of Dairy Research Centers at universities nationwide. The Centers will help the industry in the long run by providing a new foundation for the education and training of dairy food scientists for industry, academic and public service careers.

The Board will provide approximately $1.5 million a year for the program. Each Center will receive approximately one-third of its funding from the Board, with others, including the university and local industry, contributing the remainder.

We hope that these Centers will represent almost every dairy producing region in the country.

PROMOTION STRUCTURE

As many of you may know now, the National Milk Producers Federation appointed a dairy Promotion Structure Committee which has spent the past six monts reviewing the promotion structure of the industry.

That Committee has reported to the National Milk Executive Committee and will be bringing its concepts to the attention of the UDIA Board, National Diary Board and boards of local units during the next few weeks.

The Committee report is an attempt at a compromise plan. After extensive discussion and review, it will be presented to Secretary Lyng.

As changes in the promotion structure are considered, it is important for everyone involved to remember that we must stay within the law, or be prepared to ask Congress to change the law. If we ask for changes, we must realize that we run the risk of getting changes that we, as an industry, do not want.

On the other hand, we must be careful in our interpretation of the law. We must realize that the law is not what we want it to be, it is what Congress gave us. Many experts spent a great deal of time preparing the language with a specific purpose in mind. We have to look at it objectively, without attempting to bend the words to fit our ideas.

In any event, we must be prepared to realize that the Department of Agriculture and the Justice Department ultimately will determine the meaning and correct interpretation of the law.

WRAP UP

Looking back at our last year's efforts, I am quite pleased with the bottom-line results. The National Dairy Board was created by Congress to increase the sale of dairy products. According to the preliminary findings, we are meeting that mandate and finding higher than anticipated increases in dairy product use.

The 1983 farm bill that established the National Dairy Board projected that the increased advertising would push dairy product sales up by two percent. U.S.D.A. statistics indicate that, since the Board's inception, sales have far surpassed that prediction.

According to the U.S.D.A., milk and dairy product commerical use totaled more than 131 billion pounds in 1985, 3.7 percent more than in 1984. And, in 1984, the same category totaled 126.5 billion pounds, 3.3 percent more than in 1983. The total increase during this two-year period is seven percent, or 8.6 billion additional pounds of milk and diary products used commercially, the largest two-year increase in memory.

Of course, many factors influence these commercial use statistics. Real prices are going down. Real income is going up. Unemployment continues to decline. And more money has been spent on dairy product advertising, promotion and research.

The impact of today's dairy promotion dollars is significant, however. In the past, all of the other factors—dropping prices, increasing income and decreasing unemployment—have been present without resulting in a similar increase in dairy product use. Clearly, advertising, promotion and research are having a significant effect on American consumers nationwide.

As we look ahead to our third year of promotion and research work, I am excited by our past success and the challenges before us. With your continued support, the National Dairy Board will work to continue this dramatically positive trend.●

HILTON HAWAIIAN VILLAGE

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, tourism is of fundamental importance to the State of Hawaii. It is our largest source of revenue and a major source of employment for our citizens. I am thus pleased to note the presence of a delegation of Hawaiian performers and businessmen who are in Washington this week to inaugurate an $80 million renovation of one of Hawaii's premier hotels—the Hilton Hawaiian Village. Leading the delegation is Mr. Earl McDonough, senior vice president of Hilton Hotels in Hawaii, who will unveil a master plan for the renovation entitled, "A Return to Paradise." I trust that my colleagues and the American people will take advantage of the first-class facilities and service available in the Aloha State when planning their vacations.●

WEDNESDAY'S CHILD

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, newborn babies are in constant demand for people wishing to adopt, but there is a group of forgotten children desperately seeking families to call their own. These kids have been classified as hard-to-place children. They are usually past kindergarten age, may have been abused when they were younger, and many of them have physical impediments of one kind or another. They are much harder to place with parents than healthy newborn babies. But a relatively new program in the State of Oregon is working to improve the odds against the hard-to-place children.

Since 1984, the Oregon Children's Services Division [CSD] and KATU Television in Portland have collaborated on a program to help find families for this special group. Together, these organizations produced a series called "Wednesday's Child." In 2 years, this television program and the local news broadcast have featured a total of 49 children. The children are interviewed and videotaped while they participate in typical children's activities such as ice skating, fishing, or eating at their favorite restaurant. A host from the TV station does the interviewing and prompts the children to reveal things about themselves that might never be expressed in an official adoptive report.

Every month, the Oregon CSD has approximately 75 to 100 children waiting for adoption. Not all of these kids can be videotaped, but the children that are can expect to be placed with a permanent family in an average of 2.2 months. Children not fortunate enough to be videotaped are processed through an adoption exchange and are usually placed in an average of 6.7 months. These two numbers can be compared with the average placement time for easy-to-place children, which is about 3 months. Easy-to-place children are defined as being zero to 6 years old and having no major physical or psychological impediments. Placing children in permanent families is more cost effective, and, more importantly, much better for the general welfare of the children. As it stands now, hard-to-place kids who do not find adoptive parents are usually moved from foster home to foster home for a variety of reasons. These kids lack the reassurance and love that comes with having a permanant family and a place to call home. The average base cost of foster care for a 10-year-old child is at least $2,700 per year. This figure is only the amount of money paid by the State to the foster family; it does not include the money spent on administrative costs or the annual medical costs of caring for a child.

Because the program has been such an overwhelming success, the Federal Government has maintained their funding support level at 100 percent and the program directors plan to feature one child per month on videotape for the coming year. Oregon CSD also plans to experiment with producing their own videotapes for inhouse use. I am excited about this program and I vigorously urge the Nation as a whole to study this creative adoption program.●

UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN DAIRY SCHOOL

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, the people of Wisconsin stand behind their dairy tradition with a great deal of pride and enthusiasm. We look to the University of Wisconsin dairy school as the vanguard to continue this strong tradition.

The dairy school, however, means much more to the State of Wisconsin than technical and scientific experimentation. It represents a long-time favorite commodity: Babcock Hall ice cream. I ask to have printed in the RECORD the tribute to the University of Wisconsin dairy school in a recent New York Times article. I thank them for sharing with the people of Wisconsin the fruits of their research so that we all may enjoy this wonderful ice cream.

[From the New York Times, June 25, 1986]

EXALTING IN ICE CREAM, EXOTIC AND PLAIN

(By Paul Fanlund)

MADISON, Wis., June 24—The mother of the bride-to-be directed an urgent letter to the University of Wisconsin's dairy store. "Having grown up in Madison on ice cream from Babcock Hall," the mother wrote on her daughter's behalf, "she'd like to have some to serve with the cake." Enough for 150 guests shipped to central Illinois in the heat of June, if you please. Such are the burdens of ice cream excellence.

If someone had told Dr. Stephen Moulton Babcock in 1890 that his name would endure for a century, he probably would have attributed the fame to his test for measuring fat in milk. That advance prompted the university to create the nation's first dairy school and, eventually, to name a building for him. Today the Babcock name is most often associated on this Big 10 campus—and throughout the city and state and among nostalgic Wisconsin alumni nationwide—not with an arcane dairy process, but with ice cream.

And not just good ice cream, but creamy, smooth, fresh ice cream scooped in generous portions for 65 cents a single dip and 85 cents a double. Prices are reviewed four times a year to insure that they cover costs but produce no profit.

Babcock Hall rotates about 75 flavors, changing its menu monthly. The old standbys are always available: vanilla, chocolate, strawberry, butter pecan, fudge marble, mint, coffee, chocolate chip and four flavors of sherbet. A recent list of the more exotic rotating flavors included blackberry cordial, black walnut, orange custard chocolate chip, caramel cashew, chocolate cake, almond chocolate, mocha chip, apple strudel, egg custard and chocolate toffee bark.

The orange custard chocolate chip—which combines chocolate chip candy, egg custard, orange essence and orange coloring—was cited in a recent book on ice creams, "The Very Best: Ice Cream and Where to Find It."

As many as 1,000 gallons of ice cream are produced every weekday in Babcock's gymnasium-sized dairy plant by the university's Food Service Department. Unlike most ice creams the ones produced here are done without a premade ice cream base. Babcock also houses a well-known cheese research institute.

The plant receives about 20,000 pounds of raw milk a day from two university-owned dairies and five private farms, turning it into all types of milk and milk products.

To avoid complaints of unfair competition from commercial ice cream producers, Babcock products are not sold off campus but are distributed at two student unions, in dormitories and at the university hospital.

The heart of Babcock Hall's ice cream consumption is the salesroom, as it is called, in Babcock Hall. The hall itself is a nondescript three-story brick building and its small Formica-dominated salesroom is similarly plain.

On most days, a procession of students and faculty members troop in past old-fashioned dairy cases containing milk butter, yogurt and cheese to wait in one of three lines—two for cones, one for sundaes and shakes.

A bulletin board has posters boosting the state's dairy industry and displays the many local and national awards Babcock ice creams have garnered. The board also features a neatly typed list of the ingredients in the current month's offerings.

It may seem appropriate that Wisconsin's major university has such an affinity for dairy products in general and ice cream in particular. After all, Wisconsin is the nation's leading producer of milk, butter and cheese. Even its nondairying citizens appear to take that image to heart. Gov. Anthony S. Earl confronted an agitated constituency last year when the state contemplated dropping its 50-year old "America's Dairyland" license plate motto. Governor Earl averted what he predicted would be an acrimonious debate in the Legislature and declared the motto safe.

While the university's dairy school has been making ice cream since about 1900, it apparently was not until the early 1950's that the products moved toward connoisseur quality. Much of the credit has been given to William C. Winder, who retired in 1981 as a professor of food sciences. In 1940, he began teaching a course, called Ice Cream Making and Related Products.

"I didn't think much of the quality of the ice cream they were selling," Mr. Winder explained in a recent interview. So he began "an evolutionary path" of changing ice cream mixtures and processing methods. "Even in the latter years, we changed things occasionally," he said. "But we would never grade it down just to sell it cheaper. I suppose that's the legacy I left them."

In his day, Mr. Winder and a few colleagues usually did their own taste tests. Today, Thomas Blattner, the dairy plant manager, said, new flavors are run through a "sensory analysis laboratory," a formal process of taste panels comprising graduate students and faculty members.

The no-scrimping philosophy endures, however. Mr. Blattner said Babcock uses only fresh milk, thus avoiding what he called the undesirable flavor of whey powder, which many commercial ice cream makers use to cut costs.

Babcock uses only cane sugar for a clean, sweet flavor, he said, instead of corn syrup used in some ice creams, which he said creates a flat sensation. For a fuller texture, Babcock ice cream contains 12 percent butterfat, 2 percentage points more than the legal minimum for labeling a product ice cream, Mr. Blattner added.

Regular customers love almost anything chocolate, Mr. Blattner said, and there are usually 5,000 or so customers a week (except in the dead of winter, when it drops to about 2,500 a week). But Babcock's patrons are also game for the exotic flavors, he said.

Still, there is an occasional flop. Ice cream flavored with licorice chips was one. And there are the slow movers; the flour sherbet flavors are in that category, Mr. Blattner said. "I've heard people speculate we are Dairyland U.S.A. and people prefer high butterfat products," he said. "I don't know." Whatever the reason, he added, "sherbet just doesn't fly in this part of the world."●

UKRAINIAN FREEDOM

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, this coming week all America will celebrate the rededication of the Statue of Liberty. Her message and spirit represents the deepest yearnings of mankind. As we celebrate, we will glory in the triumphs of freedom and the just struggles won.

As we do so, let us not forget those whose struggle for freedom has yet to be won, and those whose just battle continues.

June 30 marks an important date, an anniversary we should also note this coming week. June 30, 1941, is a day of profound importance in the history of the struggle for Ukrainian freedom. As such, it is a day of importance for all people who love freedom.

On June 30 we commemorate the 45th anniversary of the proclamation of the restoration of Ukraine's independence.

As the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists fought both Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union, the fighting in the Ukraine was bitter, and the bravery and sacrifice of the Ukrainian people was inspired. Yet, eventually, the Soviet army reoccupied, and Ukraine was no longer free.

This coming weekend, the commemorative committee of the 45th anniversary of the restoration of Ukraine's independence on June 30, 1941, will hold a commemorative banquet in Warren, MI.

As all of us celebrate in the relighting of Miss Liberty's torch, let us remember the flame of freedom which also still burns in the soul of the Ukrainian people. As we celebrate our freedom, let us remember and honor the millions of Ukrainians who have fought, sacrificed, and struggled for their freedom. As we celebrate our liberty, let us remember and pray for Miroslav Medvid who symbolizes the desire and struggle for liberty that cannot be extinguished.

As the flame of liberty burns, it burns for all people who value and struggle for freedom. Her flame burns for the tenacious spirit of the Ukrainian people who will never abandon the dream and struggle for freedom.●

S. 2064, THE NATIONAL STRATEGY ACT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Virginia, in cosponsoring S. 2064, the National Strategy Act, which requires the President to make an annual report to Congress on the national strategy of the U.S. Government regarding our foreign policy and international objectives.

It is apparent that it is necessary to improve the communication between the administration and Congress on the matters of foreign policy and national defense. Presently, this information is transmitted in a very chaotic and incoherent manner. The National Strategy Act will provide a single and unified forum for communication on these important areas between the executive and legislative branches of Government to provide a base from which to begin the budget process.

Under the provisions of S. 2064, all information regarding the administration's views on issues of national strategy will be presented comprehensively to the Congress as a unified package. The presentation of this information in a coherent fashion is, indeed, vital to the swift and effective execution of the legislative process.

Furthermore, this bill will require that the administration formulate a more cohesive foreign policy. Administration officials will have to agree on a single text, rather than each department doing so separately. It is obvious that improving intragovernmental communication will make the entire national strategy policy process more efficient. In the age of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and $300 billion defense budgets, it is imperative that everything possible be done to improve the efficiency of Government. This proposed legislation furthers this goal by gathering important information and presenting it all at once in a comprehensive manner, rather than in several—sometimes contradictory or ambiguous—pieces and over a period of several months. Reaching a consensus on national strategy requires a huge amount of cooperation and coordination among the different departments and offices of the Government. This legislation will go a long way in providing and encouraging that cooperation.

We have before us an opportunity to increase the effectiveness of Congress in dealing with the administration and in crafting a budget. I commend the senior Senator from Virginia for his efforts on this important legislative effort, and I strongly urge my colleagues to join me as cosponsors.●

ENGLISH LANGUAGE AMENDMENT

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, over the past few months I have received many letters of support for Senate Joint Resolution 20, the English language amendment, which 16 of my colleagues and I sponsor. These letters come from all over the United States; from organizations and societies representing large numbers of Americans from many ethnic backgrounds: Dutch, Hungarian, Turkish, Ukranian, Italian, Romanian, Thai, Greek, Czech, Danish, Jamaica, Polish, Afghan, Swedish, and numerous others.

Many of these organizations include strong statements of pride in their ethnic heritage and native language, as indeed they should. As sponsors of the ELA we encourage all Americans to reinforce their strong ties with the culture and language of their ancestors. We also encourage our people to become fluent in foreign languages so that America may become more competitive in this global economy.

However, all the letters of endorsement also make strong statements of support for the English language amendment. From a large Pennsylvania-based fraternal association comes this statement:

We concur fully . . . that the United States Congress has the opportunity to leave behind a legacy to generations of Americans. The English Language Amendment makes it clear that the knowledge and mastery of the English language is essential to full and complete participation in American society.

From another ethnic society:

We believe that there can be only one official language for political and national cohesion.

Another national council founded in 1918 and based in Illinois spoke of its strong efforts to preserve the culture of the motherland then added:

At the same time, we have always stressed the necessity of learning English as soon as possible and becoming an active part of American life.

Mr. President, in closing I wish to read a moving letter I recently received from Rolling Meadows, IL:

As an ethnic American, my family and I fully support the proposed amendment to the Constitution now in Congress which seeks to have English legally recognized as the one and only language of the United States.

In 1950 we came to the United States under Truman's Displaced Person Act as victims of the Communist coup d'etat in Czechoslovakia with no knowledge of the English language. I took some English lessons before coming to the United States during our stay in Austria. My wife and two minor sons did not speak English at all.

"When we arrived in Chicago, sponsored by the Church World Service Organization, we were immediately introduced to an English speaking world. My older son, then seven years old, forthwith attented a grade school in Chicago. Since he did not speak English he was placed in the first grade. Within six weeks he already mastered the English language and was advanced to the second grade. My younger son, then four years old, spoke fluent English within a short time and had no difficulties in school. Both of my sons were on the honor roll of their schools.

I, myself, went to John Marshall Law School attending night courses. During the day I worked in factories to support my family, and later in a church as a business administrator. After graduating from law school I established myself as an attorney. Both my sons are college graduates; the older one owns a successful insurance company, and the younger one is an attorney himself employed as a corporate lawyer with a Chicago industrial firm.

I would like to emphasize how important it is to master the English language, which opens up every possibility for a successful career. In my opinion, billingualism is not the way for achieving success in our great land of opportunity. Recognition of a common language is necessary to preserve the basic internal unity required for political stability and national cohesion. The proposed amendment would reaffirm the importance of English in our national life. It would clarify to newcomers that learning English is indispensable for full participation in American society and economy. It would reaffirm that we are truly "One Nation, indivisible."

Mr. President, I ask that any of my colleagues who wish to join us in this effort please contact my office. We will happily supply you with information, and will welcome your support.●

BALTIC FREEDOM DAY

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, earlier this month was the anniversary of the occupation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union. This marks the 46th year since the people of Estonia, Lithuania, and Latvia lost the freedom to express their culture openly. Mass deportation has occurred and systematic repopulation. The Soviet occupation of the Baltic States represents an attempt to destroy a culture. However, the fight to hold on to this culture still continues.

The nations of Estonia, Lithuania, and Latvia remain under illegal rule by the Soviet Union. The Soviets continue to deport millions of Estonians, Lithuanians, and Latvians to remote parts of the Soviet Union. At the same time, the Soviet Union has introduced large numbers of Russians into the Baltic States in an attempt to displace the Baltic culture. However, the Communists have been unable to completely crush the spirit and determination of the Baltic people.

I am privileged to celebrate June 14 as Baltic Freedom Day. This day was created to ensure that the illegal Soviet occupation of the Baltic States is not accepted as legitimate by the international community. The United States has never recognized the illegal occupation of the Baltic States.

The persecution that continues in the Baltic States should never be forgotten. June 14 stands "as a symbol of the solidarity of the American people with the aspirations of the enslaved Baltic people." The spirit of the Baltic people to renew and express their culture can be seen as an example to people of suppressed cultures around the world. I can only hope that one day democracy will ultimately prevail and the sovereignty of these three nations will be restored.●

WILLIAM S. WOODSIDE, A CORPORATE LEADER FOR PUBLIC EDUCATION

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, William S. Woodside is the chairman of the American Can Co. Mr. Woodside was elected chairman of American Can in 1980, following 30 years of service as a manager in a variety of posts with that company. He has been a director of the company since 1975, served as president from 1975 to April 1981 and CEO from 1980 to April 1986. He holds the bachelors degree in business administration from Lehigh University and a masters degree in economics from the Harvard University. He joined American Can as the company's first economist in 1950.

As chairman, Mr. Woodside has been the architect of American Can's strategic redirection program, which included the sale of the billion-dollar paper products sector and a move into insurance and financial services.

I first learned of Mr. Woodside's extraordinary efforts in support of education during his testimony before a joint hearing of the Senate Subcommittee on Education, Arts and Humanities and the House Subcommittee on Elementary, Secondary and Vocational Education on the subject of adult illiteracy. He made an excellent presentation to the committee about both the importance of assuring an educated citizenry for business purposes and increasing our economic competitiveness. American Can, under the direction of Mr. Woodside, has made a commitment to education in a very concrete way. Last fall, a comprehensive report on illiteracy was completed with the support of American Can. That corporation, because of the personal interest of its chairman, continues to support programs for illiterate adults which show foresight for increasing both human potential, and the contributions of an educated work force to U.S. industry.

Recently, Mr. Woodside spoke at the readership forum of the Institute for Educational Leadership. In his remarks he describes the increasing importance of providing a strong education foundation for all public school students and business' role in assuring quality and relevance in the curriculum. I commend to my colleagues Mr. Woodside's May 1, 1986 address.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Woodside's remarks be included in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

REMARKS OF WILLIAM S. WOODSIDE

I stand before you a satisfied consumer. Two former Fellows of the Institute for Educational Leadership hold key positions at the American Can Company Foundation. Fay Reisler, IEL Class of '79, is our Associate Director. Miguel Garcia, IEL Class of '85, is the analyst of our National Themes Program. Julie Latzer, also of the IEL Class of '85, provides staff support to me in my capacity as Chairman of the New York City Partnership's Education Committee. Dan Merenda, IEL Class of '79, runs the national School Volunteer Program which is the recipient of the largest national theme grant our Foundation has given thus far. And, of course, our work with your leader, Mike Usdan—I won't tell you his class year—has been enormously satisfying and productive. It is because I have this firsthand knowledge of your organization and its people that I am particularly delighted to be here today.

I want to preface my remarks this afternoon by noting that whenever we discuss educational leadership, we tend to talk about political leaders, business leaders, school boards and administrators, community organizations and professional organizations. But we tend to forget the leadership that occurs inside the classroom—the personal leadership and guidance provided by teachers who care about their students, who take great pride and joy in their work, but whose leadership impact may not be felt—or recognized—until long after the student has graduated. In my mind, a conference on the leadership factors in education policy is long overdue. But as we look at the issues involved in educational leadership, let us also pledge to ourselves that we will not overlook the leadership role our teachers play in our lives and our society—and how indebted so many of us are to so many of them.

You have given me a broad mandate: to discuss the corporate role in supporting education and the leadership factor in encouraging support for education. I have decided to scale down that mandate and discuss two issues. First, the need to clarify the role the business community can play in public education; and in so doing I want to make some specific statements about the appropriate role of the private sector with respect to a broad range of domestic social issues. Second, I want to touch upon the need to view public education within the context of the other social problems that impinge upon the educational process; to help clarify just what we want our schools to achieve and to make sure we do not hold them responsible for problems they did not create and should not be expected to solve.

In some respects, my presence here today is one measure of how far we have come in establishing a business role in public education. Ten years ago, the topic you assigned me would not have been on anyone's agenda. Back then, you may recall, corporations and public schools had little contact with each other. Business was involved with higher education. The elementary and secondary schools were not an area of our concern. Somewhere along the line though, in the midst of national concern about public education, the economy and our cities, the business community gradually began to realize that we did in fact have an important stake in the future of our public schools. Some may find that change surprising. I do not. Many business leaders, myself included, are products of our public schools. We have an intensely personal appreciation of their contribution to society and their value to the individual. We are troubled when our schools are in trouble because we know that if our schools decline, our cities and communities also will decline. We are troubled because we know that without a first-rate system of public education—and one that is first-rate for everyone and not just for some—our nation will not change for the better. The growth in corporate involvement in public education also reflects a change in how corporations see themselves in relationship to society. Many within the business world now know they cannot exist as isolated, autonomous islands, walled off from the communities in which they are located. So, instead of defining institutional relationships in terms of the barriers and differences that keep them apart, many corporations are seeking to define their relationship to community institutions in terms of the goals and values they share in common. Granted, it has been a long time coming, but the private sector is now beginning to acknowledge, on a wider scale than we once thought possible, the fact that no community can prosper if its members, including corporations and public schools, have no contact with each other or have no common ground on which to meet together and to work together.

The school-business partnership programs that have developed around the country are a strong indication of this change in attitude. Nobody is keeping precise records, but the number of corporations involved in partnership programs such as Join-A-School, Loaned Executive Programs, mentoring programs and curriculum development programs has grown dramatically. These programs are important. They provide the business community with a much needed window on the world of public education. But partnership programs also have their liabilities. One of the most serious liabilities is that by focusing so extensively on what is happening in the private sector, we will ignore what is happening, or not happening, in the public sector. I want partnership programs to grow and flourish. But I do not want declining public support for public education to become the price we pay for private sector involvement. And it is up to us, as business leaders and education leaders, to use our influence and our energy to make sure this does not happen.

Let me remind you that the concept of public-private partnerships came into vogue at the same time limits on government spending and limits on government involvement in social programs started to become popular. Proponents of cutbacks in government programs and services seized on the partnership concept as evidence that government programs could be reduced without causing much harm, dislocation or hardship. People who opposed these reductions, on the other hand, beaten at the polls in various elections, grasped at the partnership concept as a way of preserving some services that otherwise might be lost. There is no question in my mind that we all subscribed to a very good idea. The problem, I submit, is that we overstated its potential. Our vision was so focused on the role of the private sector that we failed to fully understand the enormous implications of the changes in thinking that were occurring within the political system with respect to the role the public sector should play in public education or in assuming responsibility for various other domestic social problems.

A recent proposal by Secretary of Education William Bennett provides a good illustration. Secretary Bennett wants to provide $600 worth of vouchers so low-income children who are not doing well in public schools can attend private schools. The issue, however, is not how one feels about vouchers. The issue is that vouchers are being proposed as a way of dismantling federal aid to education. They are being proposed as an alternative to the Title I Program, now called Chapter I, at a time when the need for this program may be greater than at any time in its 20-year history. What happens if such a misguided proposal should ever by chance be enacted? Will the school-business partnership programs provide the New York City schools with the $300 million it receives each year from the Title I Program? Or, to take another example, can school-business partnership programs provide New York City with the $100 million loss in public education funds that could occur in the first full year of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Balanced Budget Act? Can we count on public-private partnership programs to provide increased salaries and better working conditions for teachers, to keep our school libraries filled with books, to provide the additional financing and organizational structure so that successful innovations can be applied on a larger scale? The answer, of course, is "No."

School-business partnerships can develop some useful and innovative programs. They can even help us to set a national education agenda. But they cannot provide the financial and leadership foundation that can help us solve our education problems—and we need to stop acting as if they can. When corporations first started developing partnership programs several years ago, many of us said we did not want to become involved in public education to let government off the hook. We said we did not want government using our involvement as an excuse to ignore its own responsibility. We said we did not want our programs to become a screen of voluntarism behind which an entire generation young people, too many of them underprivileged, would be denied basic opportunity and justice. The time has come for all of us—business leaders and educators—to make good on that promise. It is time for all of us to combine the knowledge we have gained with the resources already at our disposal and become active and organized advocates in behalf of an increased and more defined public role in public education; a role that does not necessarily try to recreate the Sixties but which prepares us for the educational needs of the Eighties and Nineties.

That brings me to my second point. When we look at the socio-demographics of our current and future school-age population, we see the following:

Nearly 25% of American children live in households whose incomes are below the poverty line.

Nearly half the black children in America under the age of six live in poverty.

More and more students are coming from single-parent homes.

There are an increasing number of students for whom English is not the native language.

Some 23 of the largest 35 school systems in the country are "majority minority" school systems—systems in which students from minority groups comprise the majority of all students.

There is a continuing drop in the number of high school graduates, particularly in the Northeast, and a 40% dropout rate among Hispanics.

In addition, teenage pregnancy is on the rise, and so is teenage unemployment and teenage crime.

There are some positive signs in the data. The number of black middle-class students is increasing. But the overwhelming message of the demographic material, as Harold L. Hodgkinson concluded in an IEL study, is that the children in our school systems and coming into our school systems, are increasingly poorer, more ethnically and linguistically diverse, and they have more handicaps that affect their learning.

This is not an isolated observation. Some months ago, the New York Times published a front-page article on poverty and youth that began with the following lead paragraph:

"Complex social, economic and political factors are creating a vast new class of poor Americans who are much younger, less educated and more likely to give birth sooner than recent generations of the poor."

The material in the article prompted U.S. Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan to observe that the United States of today may be the first society in history where children are much worse off than adults. "It is time we realized," Senator Moynihan said, "that we have a problem of significant social change unlike anything we have experienced in the past."

One implication of this trend seems clear. The public schools, more than ever, will be looked upon as the critical avenue of opportunity for disadvantaged youth. They will be called upon to play a greater, more comprehensive role in shaping our society than at any time during the past half century. If the schools are to succeed in this task this nation must begin responding, in a fundamental way, to the deep-seated and long-standing inequities that exist in our society. If our schools are to succeed, our students must no longer feel that they have no place in this society, and their experience must no longer tell them they have few opportunities outside the classroom door. Otherwise, we will be placing an almost impossible burden on our schools, setting before them a task that no institution, no matter how well equipped, no matter how well staffed, no matter how well funded, can handle by itself.

If we rely on a single institution to respond to injustice, poverty and lack of opportunity, we will eventually undermine the contribution that institution legitimately can make in its own right. Poverty, homelessness, hunger, unemployment, alienation and lack of opportunity do not begin in our schools. They only become more visible in our schools because the school is where the reality of poverty and the idea of opportunity come into conflict most directly and most frequently among our young people.

Let me give you an example of one area where we can make a difference before our young people enter the public schools. The relationship between good nutrition and the ability to learn has been thoroughly documented in many studies during the past several years. Millions of children who live in poverty depend on the various child nutrition and food stamp programs that now are threatened with another round of budget cuts and regulatory restrictions—even though the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Balanced Budget Act exempted child nutrition programs from its purview.

The most cost-effective nutrition program is the Special Supplemental Food Program for Women, Infants and Children—The WIC Program. Studies show that $3 in medical costs are saved for every $1 spent in a WIC Program. The WIC Program, though, only serves one-third of the people who are eligible for its benefits. Yet another 27,000 people are in danger of being dropped from the program altogether. At some point, that kind of shortsightedness is going to show up in our educational system. And once again, the schools will be asked why they can't do their job.

You can find the same kind of story in the Head Start Program. At least three million children are eligible for Head Start, and there is general agreement that statewide Head Start programs would be one of the best strategies for improving the educational future of low-income children. But only 400,000 children are enrolled in Head Start programs throughout the country. That's only 13% of the eligible population. And there are no plans to expand the program.

In the meantime, we still have to face the fact that the demographics of public school support are changing. The number of households with school-aged children is declining. Three years ago, people 65 and older surpassed teenagers as a percentage of our population. By 1990, people under the age of 20 will comprise less than 30 percent of our population for the first time. A steadily increasing percentage of Americans no longer has any direct and immediate contact with public education. As a result, many feel they no longer have a stake in what happens to our schools. Our task—yours as well as mine—is to clearly and often articulate the compelling case that everyone in this country has a stake in our schools. This is a leadership issue and a challenge that awaits you.

I trust that the IEL Fellowship Program will prepare you well to provide the kind of educational leadership that is so very essential to future generations of Americans. Your opportunities will be enormous—but so too, will be your responsibilities.

In closing, I thought about ending my remarks with a quotation about leadership taken from one of the Greek philosophers or from an American President. But in the final analysis it was Sergeant Preston of the Yukon who perhaps said what I wanted to convey most succinctly when he told his enraptured television viewers, "that only the lead dog gets to enjoy the change in scenery."

We need a change in scenery with respect to a broad range of social and educational policy in this country, and I hope that you will be the ones out in front.

Thank you and very best wishes.●

S. 2331, MEDICARE QUALITY PROTECTION ACT OF 1986

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleagues from Pennsylvania, Senator HEINZ, and several members from both sides of the aisle as a cosponsor of S. 2331, the Medicare Quality Protection Act of 1986.

We all, Mr. President, like to have the confidence that, when we need it, we will have access to affordable, high quality health care—and older Americans are no exception. In fact, the possibility of not being able to gain access to affordable, high quality health care is perhaps more troublesome to this group than any other. It was primarily for this reason that the Medicare system was established in 1965. Today, Medicare provides the bulk of health care protection for our Nation's 27 million elderly.

For years, Medicare functioned as a cost-based reimbursement system; however, eventually it became clear that the actual expenses being paid by Medicare were exceeding the services provided. It was this realization, coupled with a desire to maintain the financial stability of the Medicare system in tight fiscal times—that prompted Congress, in 1983, to begin paying Medicare claims prospectively. In doing so, Congress dramatically altered the nature of Medicare reimbursement to hospitals. We knew then that these were major changes, and that ultimately some slight alterations might have to occur due to problems we would discover in this new system. Nonetheless, implementation of the prospective payment system was the right thing to do.

Mr. President, the prospective payment system has now been in place for nearly 3 years—a time during which we have closely watched and studied the impact it has had on both beneficiaries and providers. We have learned much from the input of both beneficiaries and providers during this period—both through individual correspondence related to this issue and the oversight hearings that have been held in both houses. As a result of this activity, we have discovered several problems which are addressed by this legislation.

S. 2331, the Medicare Quality Protection Act, seeks to make changes which will ensure that Medicare beneficiaries are receiving top quality medical care, and changes which should lead to fair reimbursement rates for hospitals. Although this legislation is not the total answer, I believe it represents a major step toward the fine-tuning of the prospective payment system and will afford us the opportunity to address the issue of quality health care for older Americans.

First, we discovered a disturbing number of cases in which Medicare patients are being discharged from the hospital before they have recovered—frequently coined as—"quicker and sicker"—or released when the patient has homecare needs and that patient has no access to homecare services. The prospective payment system provides hospitals with the incentive to reduce the length of the hospital stay, so that acute care is provided only as long as medically necessary—after the patient is medically ready, he or she is released from the hospital. This policy, in and of itself, makes good sense; however, in some cases, posthospital care is necessary for a full and complete recovery. What has become clear, is that some Medicare beneficiaries do not have access to the needed pasthospital care.

The Medicare Quality Protection Act addresses this situation by seeking to ensure beneficiary access to necessay posthospital nursing home, and home care, by making permanent the waiver of liability—releasing the patient of responsibility for certain expenses—and by broadening its scope of applicability. Specifically, this would include denials related to intermittency requirements and those who are homebound, those cases which have created the most major difficulties for beneficiaries and providers. This provision of the bill serves to refine and strengthen action taken on the reconciliation bill.

In addition, the Medicare Quality Protection Act requires the Department of Health and Human Services to develop a standard to be utilized in the determination of whether an individual beneficiary requires posthospital nursing home, home health, or other health care services. Such a standard would be used by discharge planners, health care providers and others working to serve the health care needs of Medicare beneficiaries.

Second, we discovered that occassionally, under the prospective payment system, patients with multiple or serious conditions are being prematurely discharged, inappropriately transferred or even refused admission by a hospital. One of the main factors leading to such occurrences is that the prospective payment system reimburses based on the average cost for a particular condition. There is no flexibility to account for any difference that might exist in the severity of an individual patient's illness. This has placed hospitals in an awkward position because they want to, and have the responsibility to, treat patients regardless of the severity of their illness; however, the reimbursement is sometimes not adequate. At the same time, though, the notion has been that in the aggregate things will balance out, but this appears to not always be the case.

In an attempt to address the "severity of illness" problem, The Medicare

Quality Protection Act requires the Department of Health and Human Services to develop, by January 1, 1988, a multitiered scale which will reflect variations in the severity of illness and case complexity among each diagnosis related group [DRG]. This approach will lead to improved accuracy of DRG payments to hospitals, while at the same time assuring hospitals that they will get reimbursed adequately for even the most severe cases.

Third, we discovered that most Medicare beneficiaries do not have a very good understanding of their rights under the Medicare system. When a beneficiary does not have a good understanding of his or her rights, it can sometimes open the door for abuse. For example, reports have surfaced of an occasional hospital administrator telling a patient that his cr her Medicare coverage has run out, even though that patient—and the patient's family—may not believe he or she is medically ready to leave the hospital. Without an understanding of the appeal rights, that patient may leave the hospital rather than appeal—when in fact, it may have been better for that patient to stay in the hospital for an extra couple of days. I do hope such cases are few and far between; however, it does require us to restate that hospitals have a responsibility to provide appropriate treatment for their patients—whether the treatment falls within the average number of days on which the particular DRG is based or not. The best way to prevent these type of occurrences is to provide beneficiaries with access to information regarding their appeal rights.

The Medicare Quality Protection Act requires hospitals to notify patients of their rights during the admission process. Should patients decide—after receiving written notification of their discharge—that they wish to appeal the discharge decision, they will have three calendar days to do so before becoming liable for continued days of stay. The legislation also requires the peer review organization to review the appeal within the same 3 calendar days, to prevent any situations where an appeal may be made, but not reviewed, before the patient has to begin paying for additional days.

On balance, I believe this legislation represents a good effort at beginning to fine-tune the Medicare prospective payment system. I give the Medicare Quality Protection Act my support and look forward—as a cosponsor—to working with the other Members who have cosponsored this legislation to resolve some of the minor issues that still remain unresolved. I urge others to offer their support also, as it is time that we get on with the task of fine-tuning Medicare's prospective payment system—a task that will result ultimately in assuring older Americans that they, too, can have confidence that, when needed, they will have access to affordable high quality health care.●

TRADE RELATIONS WITH THE SOVIETS

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, there has been a disturbing crescendo of support for normalization of trade relations with the Soviet Union. Some have called for a moratorium on the application of the Jackson-Vanik amendment, which prohibits the granting of most-favored-nation trading status to a Communist nation, such as the Soviet Union, that restricts the emigration of its people.

Mr. President, in the June 24 edition of the Wall Street Journal Melvyn Krauss points out that the Soviets have embarked upon a highly visible campaign to improve their human rights image in the international community. Mr. Krauss accurately asserts that this campaign is not a signal that the Soviets are in fact interested in sharply curbing their emigration restrictions, but are conducting a cosmetic charade intended to open additional international markets for their own commodities and thereby stimulate the Soviet economy.

The article states the sensible and realistic view that normalization of trade relations with the Soviets should be pursued with extreme caution and that such normalization be predicated on the progress of Soviet emigration policy far beyond its current status.

Mr. President, I ask that the article be printed in its entirety in the RECORD and commend its contents to the review of the members of the Senate.

The article follows:

STOP REWARDING THE SOVIETS FOR HUMAN-RIGHTS IMPROVEMENTS

(By Melvyn Krauss)

The Soviets clearly are on a campaign to improve their human-rights image in the West. In February, they released Anatoly Shcharansky from prison and permitted him to emigrate to Israel. In the past few weeks, Soviet authorities have announced they resolved 71 cases of divided Soviet-American families and would allow more than 200 Soviet citizens to emigrate. Why are the Soviets signaling they might be interested in relaxing their severe curbs on emigration? The answer undoubtedly has a good deal to do with the dramatic drop in the price of oil.

Mikhail Gorbachev knows better than most that the price of oil has dropped from a high of over $40 a barrel to its present level of less than $15 a barrel. He apparently has come to the conclusion that unless he can obtain increased loans and trade concessions from the West, to make up for the shortfall in foreign-exchange induced by the oil price drop, his time as the top Soviet leader could be short. Thus, the basic parameters of the Gorbachev strategy have been established: to catch the West's attention, send out a "loss-leader" like Shcharansky; then, make a deal for increased Soviet emigration in exchange for Western economic concessions.

One top Soviet priority appears to be the obtaining of most-favored-nation trade status from the U.S. The Jackson-Vanik Amendment to the 1974 Trade Act, however, prohibits the U.S. from granting most-favored-nation treatment to communist countries that restrict emigration unless the president issues a waiver on the ground that emigration curbs have been relaxed. Romania, Hungary and China are the only communist countries to currently enjoy such a waiver.

Now, it is quite clear that considerable support for the Jackson-Vanik Amendment came—and continues to come—from American Jewish leaders who are committed to a policy of buying the freedom of Soviet Jews with U.S. trade concessions. "If the Soviet Union wishes to make a movement, there's honey on the spoon," said Morris P. Abram, chairman of the National Conference on Soviet Jewry. "If the Soviets make substantial and significant changes in emigration, there will be support for a government waiver, but it's got to be very substantial."

Of course, very substantial changes in Soviet emigration practices imply very substantial U.S. trade concessions to the Soviets, and this should give pause to all Americans—both Jews and non-Jews. At a minimum, granting the Soviets most-favored-nation status would enrich our enemy. Trade gains, to some extent, would replace oil revenues as the fuel for both the Soviet military machine and Moscow's imperliistic adventures abroad.

Moreover, normalizing trade relations with the Soviets would serve to strengthen the hand of U.S. businessmen who want to sell high-tech goods to the Soviets, even goods that directly endanger our national security. "Contrary to prevailing myths in the media," writes Edward Jay Epstein in the June issue of Comentary magazine, "the vast preponderance of technology transfers from West to East proceeded not from espionage or theft but from openly arrived at deals with some of the largest corporations in the West."

Advocates of dentente often ask: What's wrong with exporting food and nonmilitary goods to the Russians? A great deal. For even when the West sends only humanitarian goods, such as wheat and butter, domestic resources are freed within the Soviet Union—resources that can be used to build tanks and missiles.

The major practical objection to this argument is that if the U.S. doesn't export to the Soviets, U.S. economic competitors in the West will. This highlights an important problem for U.S. foreign policy: If the U.S. wants to deprive the Soviets of normal economic exchange with the West, it must be willing to discipline those allies who, out of weakness or the desire to make a fast buck, undermine U.S. foreign policy.

Another reason to discard Jackson-Vanik is that the U.S. should avoid all policies that tangibly reward the Soviets for their brutal treatment of dissidents—rewards that may encourage them to take, torture and trade other dissidents in the future. The West Germans, for example, have been buying political prisoners for cash from East Germany for over a decade. But rather than decrease the total number of political prisoners held by the East German regime, this policy actually has served to increase the number.

Those who argue, as Jackson-Vanik supporters do, that the U.S. should offer the Soviets trade and other inducements to obtain human-rights progress fall into a Soviet trap. Following this advise could lead to an increased exodus of political prisoners from the Soviet Union. But this would not signify an improvement in the human-rights situation. On the contrary, it means the Soviets would be under continuing pressure to replace their stock of political prisoners for trading purposes. For every prisoner released, a new one would be found to take his place.

Indeed, one wonders how much good American Jewish leaders really do Soviet Jews when they lobby for trade concessions in return for liberalized emigration. True, some Soviet Jews will be able to leave if a Jackson-Vanik-style deal is made (just as Romania recently promised to allow 1,000 people to emigrate so that it could retain U.S. most-favored-nation trade status). But the reason many Jews are not allowed to leave the Soviet Union in the first place is the U.S. interest in Soviet emigration makes the Jews a valuable bargaining chip for the Soviets. They know that, at some point, they will be able to trade the detained Jews to the West for a handsome profit. Benign neglect, not bribery, may be the best way U.S. leaders can help Soviet Jews, and other citizens, make their exit to the West.

The case against Jackson-Vanik is in essence a part of the more general case against detente. Giving the Soviets incentives for decent behavior not only enriches them but leads to reverse linkages—that is, more—not fewer—human-rights violations are committed because the trade carrot is offered. There is, in fact, only one way the West can elicit better behavior from the Soviet leaders, and that is to reduce the resources they have at their disposal to do harm. Squeezing the Soviets—by forcing the oil price down, for example—is more likely to induce them to quit Afghanistan or to build fewer tanks and missiles than will bribes that serve only to make Soviet crimes profitable.●

JULY 4, 1986—INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. RIEGLE. This year's Fourth of July celebration is a very special one, for it marks both the 210th anniversary of American independence, and the rededication of the Statue of Liberty which, for the past 100 years has symbolized America's unity and its diversity.

Between 1886 and 1930, some 30 million immigrants were welcomed to the United States by the majestic Lady Liberty, towering over New York City's harbor. It did not take long for the statue, a gift from the people of France in honor of our democratic values, to become the symbol of freedom and of hope for a better lift to people all around the world.

Of all the nations in the world, the United States has the most generous immigration policy. Over the past century, more immigrants have come here than to any other country, and the ethnic diversity, to which each of us contributes, represents one of America's greatest resources.

I believe that our shared commitment to the principles of freedom, democracy, and respect for the individual has played a critical role in America's emergency as the most free and prosperous society on Earth. In the Declaration of Independence, Thomas Jefferson wrote that:

All men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable Rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness . . . [and] that to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

The guarantees spelled out by Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence and represented by the Statue of Liberty have withstood the rigorous test of time, and continue to distinguish this Nation from all others in its concern for the rights of its citizens.

If we are vigilant in protecting the democratic values on which America was founded, our Nation will grow even stronger and be better able to face the challenges of the future. Only through our undying commitment to preserving the freedoms which she represents will Lady Liberty's torch continue to shine as the beacon of hope for people throughout the world.●

DETAINEES UNDER SOUTH AFRICA STATE OF EMERGENCY

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, in South Africa, on June 12, a state of emergency was declared covering the entire country. Estimates of detention under the state of emergency run as high as 3,000. Under the state of emergency, detentions are authorized to be held without charge or trial. It is impossible to verify the total number or the identities of those detained, since the South African Government refuses to release that information. In addition, under the state of emergency regulations, anyone who publishes or distributes the names of people allegedly detained faces a possible 10 year jail sentence or an $8,000 fine. Local newspapers are continually frustrated in their reporting by the press restrictions, branded the tightest in the world by many lawyers. For one such paper, a small weekly titled the Mail, remaining within the bounds of South Africa's sweeping regulations has meant blacking every name in a two page spread listing detainees. Since the emergency began, three freelance workers associated with the Mail have been detained.

Despite these intimidating and dangerous circumstances, information has reached the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, Amnesty International, the World Council of Churches and other monitoring groups from sources who have placed themselves at great personal risk.

The attached list of names has been compiled through this process. The accuracy of the list cannot be definitely verified so long as the South African Government refuses to release such disappearance of hundreds of individuals.

In view of the urgency of the situation, I wish to place on record the names of some of those who are feared to have been detained.

The list follows:

THE LATE SENATOR CASE AND THE INTERSTATE HIGHWAY ANNIVERSARY

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I would like to join in celebrating the 30th anniversary of the interstate and National Defense Highway System. This immense system, which now includes nearly 41,000 miles nationwide and 678 miles in my home State of South Dakota, has truly united the States of this Nation. On this anniversary it deserves recognition as the greatest highway system in the world.

On this date I would also like to honor the late Francis Higbee Case, former Senator from South Dakota, for his dedication to and heralded efforts on the creation of our Interstate System.

Francis Case was elected to the House of Representatives in 1936, serving for seven consecutive terms until he was elected to the Senate in 1951, where he served until his death on June 22, 1962. While in the Senate as the ranking Republican on the Public Works Committee and chairman of the Subcommittee on Roads and Highways, he did much to create our Interstate System.

Senator Case was known as a quiet, almost colorless statesman. His road legislation received few headlines, and he was seldom given credit as the author of highway legislation, as many of his bills were introduced by the chairman of the committee. However, he should be credited with building a monument which archeoligists a millenium from now may find to be proof of our productive genius, or madness, or both—the Interstate Highway System."

It was Senator Case who sponsored the "pay as you go" concept. It was this concept, that the users of the highways should pay for its construction rather than adding the costs to the Federal deficit, which when included in title II of the Highway Revenue Act of 1956, allowed the Congress to give the go-ahead on construction of the Interstate System. Senator Case also sponsored amendments which provided farmers with refunds on the interstate revenue gas tax and compensated both telephone and electric companies for relocation of lines disrupted by the highway construction.

For all Senator Case did for our great Interstate System, I feel it is only fitting that his accomplishment should be recognized on this the 30th anniversary of our great Interstate and National Defense Highway System.●

SYMBOL OF UNITY

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, it is a happy circumstance that in 1986 we are celebrating not only the Year of the Flag, the 210th anniversary of our Independence and the Centennial of the Statue of Liberty. Culminating this celebration will be the Fourth of July festivities from sea to shining sea of this great land.

My constituent, Helen Williams of Rapid City, SD, in a salute to our country's heritage and endeavoring to foster a resurgence of patriotism has composed the following poem which I commend to the attention of my colleagues.

The poem follows:

THE SYMBOL OF UNITY, STRENGTH AND FREEDOM

(By Helen Williams)

Its blue, its red, its white in folds
Float gently in the tranquil breeze.
Against the sky so bright, its hues
Reflect the freshness of the day.
Our flag! It humbles all our hearts.
Each motion of its stripes and stars
Depicts the strife and toil of old
When first the stripes were cut and sewn,
And pure white stars were scattered there
To light the field of regal blue.

When winds of battle rage in war,
The flag flies on from stations proud,
And gives its strength to fighting men.
Its hues and story both entwine.
Within its flaunting golds of force.
The Courage of this banner's stand
Is drawn from deeds unpraised by men
Which symbolize the stars of white
Upon their bed of rest—the blue,
Which proudly casts their light abroad.

Each drop of blood that's drawn in war
Alights upon the shield of white,
And prints its owner's name thereon.
As long as this great flag shall fly
The stripes of red record accounts
Of gallant deeds unknown by most.
Upon the field of battlement
They saw their duty, fought and died.
A prayer which sealed their lips in death
Is that eternal peace shall reign.

Its weathered edges frayed and worn
Display a graduer 'gainst the sky.
A strength of peace as well as war,
Upholds this banner waving high.
An aged man surveys his farm
With weary steps and tired eyes.
But pride of Freedom crowns his life,
And lights his withered brow.
For every wrinkle pressed by care—
Laughter folded several there.

This man has reaped the richest crop
That men have ever planned or known.
He came to meet the challenge here
That lay beneath the flowing grass.
Because he lived in Freedom's land
This soil so rich was his to till,
And his to keep for livelihood.
The first few years were hard and long,
But family stars were bringing light
Which set again his cares aright.

When first this flag was planned and born
The people still were lightly sworn
To Unity of others rights.
Division sought to stifle Unity.
But, unified, they ended war,
And, linked together, burdens bore
Upon their shoulders—side by side.
From common problems came the Strength
To raise the flag above the land
Which now is held by Freedom's hand.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION AFTER 20 YEARS

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, 20 years ago this July 4, the Freedom of Information Act—of which I am proud to have been an original sponsor—became the law of this land. Because of this act, our country has become stronger, our people more knowledgeable, and our democracy more secure.

A recent report by People for the American Way commemorates this significant anniversary, which is occurring on the same day that our Nation celebrates the rededication of one of the greatest symbols of our freedom, the Statue of Liberty.

This report cites many important instances in which implementation of the mandate of the Freedom of Information Act has brought vital information to the attention of the public and enlightened our national debates. These examples are clear reminders that only through open government and constant vigilance can our democracy truly serve the interests of all the people of our Nation.

I commend this report to the attention of the Senate, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

THE FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT AFTER TWENTY YEARS

July 4, 1986, marks the twentieth anniversary of the Freedom of Information Act, popularly known as "FOIA." Special recognition of the Act and its contribution to our society is especially appropriate this year when the best known symbol of freedom and democracy in the world, America's Statue of Liberty, is unveiled anew, her torch rekindled. Because of the Freedom of Information Act, the democratic ideals of an informed citizenry and self-government have burned more brightly during the past twenty years than ever before in our nation's history. Celebration of the importance of the Freedom of Information Act is also fitting for a society in the midst of an information age, when policies about public access to information become decisions about the very nature of society itself.

The ideals embraced in the enactment of the Freedom of Information Act were indeed as important to the earliest champions of American democracy as they are to us today. It was James Madison who declared:

"A popular Government without popular information, or the means of acquiring it, is but a Prologue to a Farce or a Tragedy; or perhaps both. Knowledge will forever govern ignorance: And a people who mean to be their own Governors, must arm themselves with the power which knowledge gives."

Among the strongest, and probably the most ironic, declarations of the importance of open information and the relationship of government and citizens was that made by former President Richard M. Nixon. Commenting on an Executive Order concerning the classification of government records, Nixon stated to Americans:

"Fundamental to our way of life, is the belief that when information which properly belongs to the public is systematically withheld by those in power, the people soon become ignorant of their own affairs, distrustful of those who manage them, and eventually incapable of determining their own destinies."

The Freedom of Information Act is itself a symbol of a healthy democracy and the value placed upon public access to government information. Most importantly, the Act converts ideals into enforceable rights. It has enabled Americans to live safer and healthier lives, and to govern themselves more efficiently. However, neither the values nor the benefits of the Freedom of Information Act can be taken for granted. In the twentieth year of the operation of the Act it is essential that we recognize its importance, review its utility, and not hastily adopt the efforts of those wishing to restrict its impact and scope.

I. THE FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT

On July 4, 1966, the Freedom of Information Act was signed into law. The Act was designed to replace an earlier section of law under which government agencies considered themselves free to withhold information from the public under whatever subjective standard could be articulated for the occasion. Most importantly, the Freedom of Information Act set a standard of openness for government from which only deviations in well-defined areas would be allowed. The FOIA then went on to define those areas in a series of nine "exemptions." Finally, it provided a remedy for the wrongful withholding of information: the person requesting information from the government could take his or her case to court.

In 1974, the Freedom of Information Act was amended in response to widespread delay in processing requests and arbitrary withholding of information by agency officials. In 1976, the Act was amended again by a special provision of the Government in the Sunshine Act.

As established in the original Act, any person has a right, enforceable in court, of access to records of executive branch agencies of the federal government, except to the extent that such records (or portions thereof) are protected from disclosure by one of nine exemptions. It is important to note two areas of access not within the scope of the Act: (1) access to federal records by the U.S. Congress; and (2) public access to records of state government agencies. Since the enactment of the Freedom of Information Act, every state has enacted some form of open information law.

From its earliest days of passage through the present, the Freedom of Information Act has reflected the constant push and pull of the separation of powers between the Congress and the Executive Branch. Its enactment in 1966 culminated eleven years of investigations and deliberations in the U.S. House of Representatives and half as many years of consideration in the United States Senate. No department or agency spokesman supported the legislation during committee hearings and President Lyndon Johnson reluctantly signed the measure into law.

The 1966 Act mandated minimal cooperation from executive branch agencies which were able to unreasonably delay responses to requests and exercise broad administrative discretion to withhold information. Congressional oversight proceedings in the House during 1972 and in the Senate in 1973 found that departments and agencies were not faithfully administering the statute. The House Committee on Government Operations concluded in its report that the "efficient operation of the Freedom of Information Act has been hindered by 5 years of foot-dragging by the Federal bureaucracy." (H. Rept. 92-1419, p. 8)

In response to these findings of practices antagonistic to the public interest, a bipartisan effort in Congress produced amendments to strengthen the public access procedures of the Act. Although the proposals were consistently opposed by agency and department spokespeople, just as during the establishment of the 1966 Act, the Congress passed the amendments in 1974. President Gerald Ford opposed the amendments and vetoed the bill. President Ford argued that federal agencies would be unreasonably burdened by the setting of specific response times to the requests, that military secrets and confidential law enforcement files would be jeopardized, and that the bill was "unconstitutional and unworkable." A month later the bipartisan support of Congress overrode President Ford's veto and the 1974 amendments to the Freedom of Information Act became law.

Today, the tension of separation of powers between Congress and the Executive Branch continues to be felt in the Freedom of Information Act arena. Since entering office, President Ronald Reagan has launched the most aggressive campaign to oppose open information policies and amend the Freedom of Information Act by narrowing its scope. Shortly after President Reagan assumed office in 1981, Attorney General William French Smith announced that he was initiating a "comprehensive review" of the Freedom of Information Act, primarly because "years of experience have made clear that many persons are employing it in ways that Congress did not intend." Other reasons cited as prompting the study were the "costs of administering the Act and the volume of litigation it spawns."

Since 1981, President Reagan's initiative has itself spawned omnibus legislation and several narrower amendments. While the Administration's effort has been prodigious, the Congress has only approved one of the measures, The CIA Information Act of 1984. This law broadens the CIA's ability to exempt its operational files classified from FOIA disclosure. Where President Reagan has failed legislatively, however, he has succeeded through other actions, including Executive Order 12356, which broadens the permissible scope of confidentiality of executive agency information under the FOIA. In addition, the President has supported agency directors, particularly CIA director William Casey, in preventing to press from publishing information made available in courtroom trials. Director Casey threatened to prosecute the Washington Post, Time, and the Washington Times for publishing facts from a recent espionage trial. According to press accounts, President Reagan went one large step further when he personnally called the publisher of the Washington Post, Katherine Graham, and asked her not to publish the story. The story was not published.

The current Administration's agenda for restricting public access to government information has created among the greatest tensions between the Congress and the Executive Branch in the history of the Freedom of Information Act. Once again, the bipartisan efforts in Congress have been rejected by the Executive Branch. At the June 5, 1986 hearing on the most recent effort to amend the Freedom of Information Act, Representative Glenn English, Chairman of the Subcommittee on Government Information, Justice, and Agriculture, announced with regret:

"Our efforts to find a compromise that would be acceptable to the community of FOIA requesters and to the Reagan Administration have failed. Each side has a completely different view of the problems with the FOIA and a completely different agenda. It proved impossible to find enough common ground to support a compromise."

Chairman English, who has worked closely with the ranking Republican on the Subcommittee, Representative Tom Kindness, and others, including Representative Gerald Kleczka, went on to describe the polarization of positions fostered by the Reagan Administration.

"Until there is a real commitment to FOIA in the executive branch, only minor improvements can come through legislative action.

"Perhaps there is a lesson here for the Reagan Administration as well. Some believe that there has been a deliberate campaign on the part of the Administration to undermine the operation of the FOIA. This perception has intensified opposition to legislative changes. If agencies would begin to demonstrate a clear commitment to improved processing of FOIA requests, the Administration might discover that some of the opposition to its legislative proposals would diminish."

II. PUBLIC BENEFITS FROM THE FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT

Although Congress and the Executive Branch continue to be at odds over the Freedom of Information Act, American society has reaped enormous benefits from its enactment. Upon reviewing the contributions of the Freedom of Information Act to American society, one can only conclude that if such a law did not exist in the United States then it would have to be invented. The Freedom of Information Act stands alone in granting a judicially enforceable right of public access to records of federal agencies. The exercise of that right by the public and the press has made a positive impact on government efficiency and costs, the health and safety of American citizens, and has promoted essential principles of democracy in the United States. Furthermore, evidence indicates a lack of factual basis for some criticism of the Freedom of Information Act pertaining to threats to national security and investigative law enforcement, and the role of the courts in enforcing rights granted in the Act. The following are a few examples of contributions of the Freedom of Information Act in attacking government inefficiency, promoting public health and safety and documenting federal grantmaking to unqualified recipients.

A. Disclosures of government inefficiency and waste

1. National Aeronautics and Space Administration

Federal audits of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), obtained through Freedom of Information Act requests, have revealed to the public, for the first time, a history of poor management at NASA. The significance of these disclosures lies not only in the revelation of agency mismanagement and waste of billions of taxpayers dollars. Experts have concluded that mismanagement, detailed in federal audits, has severely hurt the space program and is directly linked to safety problems that culminated in the Challenger explosion and the death of its seven astronauts.

The documents obtained through FOIA requests describe administrative deficiencies and spending abuses at NASA for the past 15 years in virtually every area of NASA operations. The space shuttle program was just one of many areas scrutinized by Government inspectors, other programs include those to develop satellites and planetary probes, space experiments, as well as the establishment of NASA headquarters and field centers.

Specifically, the federal audits singled out the Marshall Space Center in Huntsville, Alabama, for particulary poor management. The Marshall Space Center was responsible for contracting and monitoring the booster rockets and fuel tanks in the failed Challenger mission. The General Accounting Office auditors reported in November 1985 that the Marshall Space Center improperly monitored defective equipment. Less than two months later, the rocket boosters maintained and managed at Marshall were the single greatest source of mechanical failure leading to the Challenger disaster on January 28, 1986. (New York Times, April 23, 1986) FOIA requester—New York Times.

2. Department of Defense

Federal audits of the top ten defense contractors were conducted by the Defense Contract Audit Agency and publicly disclosed through a Freedom of Information Act request to the United States Air Force. Originally the Air Force rejected the request for disclosure of the audits to avoid competitive injury to the companies involved. However, the request was taken to court where a federal judge ordered the Air Force to disclose the information.

The audits disclosed by the Air Force revealed that the defense contractors were routinely charging lobbying costs to their defense contracts as legitimate business expenses. The Defense Contract Auditing Agency estimated that between 1974-1975 these ten contractors alone charged the Department of Defense at least $2 million in lobbying costs and $2.5 million in entertainment costs. Examples of these abuses ranged from Lockheed Aircraft claiming travel expenses to the Paris Air Show, including first class airfare for the executives and their wives, to Raytheon Corporation claiming the cost of a goosehunt for company employees and their guests.

As a result of these disclosures, Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger launched an indepth investigation into such practices allowing contractors to siphon off funds for weapon systems in order to deepen business ties with the government. New policies were subsequently established to control such abuses by the Pentagon. (Common Cause Magazine, August, 1981, p.16-23) FOIA requester—Common Cause.

B. Disclosures regarding public health and safety

1. Cancer Risks Associated with Atomic Bomb Facilities

An Atomic Energy Commission study of cancer rates of 30,000 workers in "Plutonium City", an atomic bomb facility in Hanford, Washington, during World War II, was disclosed to the public for the first time in 1978 through a Freedom of Information Act request. The study was begun in 1964 by a professor at the University of Pittsburgh. In 1975, after 11 years of work on the study, the Department of Energy, assuming the responsibilities for the Atomic Energy Commission, abandoned the project claiming as the reason the "imminent retirement" of the professor in charge. In fact the professor had six years before retirement, and the study was shelved because of the extensive findings directly linking work at "Plutonium City" with increased rates of cancer among workers. (Washington Star, August 3, 1978, p. A10) FOIA requester—Washington Star.

2. Effects of Painkilling and Anesthetic Drugs Administered To Women During Childbirth

A study conducted for the National Institutes of Health showing a clear connection between the administration of certain medications to mothers during childbirth and the impairment of brain development, was disclosed to the public for the first time in 1979 through a Freedom of Information Act request.

At the time the study was conducted, 95% of all births in the United States were medicated. The study determined that certain painkilling and anesthetic drugs administered to women during childbirth resulted in brain impairment, but government review of the study eliminated key findings, diluted the author's conclusions, and delayed publication in a medical journal in May of 1978. The study was unpublished at the time of the FOIA request in 1979. (San Francisco Examiner, January 14, 1979, p. 13) FOIA requester—UPI.

3. Adverse Effects of Arthritis Drug

Public disclosure of adverse reaction data on an arthritis drug linked to severe liver damage resulting in dozens of deaths, was accomplished through a FOIA request to the Food and Drug Administration. The drug, Oraflex, was removed from the market amidst allegations that the FDA had rushed throught the approval.

At the center of the controversy over disclosure was evidence that the drug manufacturer actively repressed the reaction data it provided to the FDA by marking it "Trade Secret/Confidential." The drug manufacturer was attempting to exempt its own evidence of the harmful effects of the drug through use of one such FOIA exemption related to trade secrets and information of competitive value to businesses. (Testimony of Dr. Sidney Wolfe before the House Subcommittee on Government Information, Justice and Agriculture—hearings on S. 774, May-August, 1984) FOIA requester—Public Citizen Health Research Group.

C. Disclosures regarding tax evasion

A 1975 FOIA request disclosed the results of a 1973 Internal Revenue Service survey on small business compliance with federal tax laws. The survey was conducted as part of the IRS's Taxpayer Compliance Management Program to uncover the extent of tax evasion and improve compliance enforcement.

The survey detailed that 33% of all small businesses (i.e. businesses with assets under $1 million) had been underpaying their federal income taxes; and that 28% of these companies went entirely undetected by IRS compliance enforcement mechanisms by the end of each year.

The survey enabled the IRS to measure the extent of tax evasion, and in some cases begin to recover the taxes owed to the federal government. For example, it was determined that in 1969 small businesses had under paid $641 million in federal taxes. The IRS was able to recover $194 million of this amount. Overall the survey concluded that small businesses are able to escape undetected because most small corporations are not audited by the IRS. (New York Times, July 21, 1975, p. 31) FOIA requester—Corporate Accountability Group.

D. Disclosures from the Department of Justice

In 1986, following much attention focused on controversial federal grants for juvenile justice programs, a Freedom of Information Act request was filed with the Department of Justice. The FOIA request produced documents revealing that a large domestic violence prevention grant amounting to $622,905 was made to a controversial group with no track record in preventing family violence, nor the objectivity necessary to adequately address the problems of family violence.

The FOIA request had asked for documents relating to any grants made to Phyllis Schlafly or the Eagle Forum. Documents provided showed that a $622,905 grant was made from the Department of Justice's Office of Justice Programs to the Task Force on Families in Crisis. In a letter from the Executive Director of the Task Force on Families in Crisis to the Department of Justice dated April 18, 1986, it was stated that "the only reason we made application in the first place was because we believe the government has an obligation to balance the tremendous amounts of government money already given to feminist groups . . ."

Documents provided through the FOIA request demonstrated that the Task Force was a screen for the Eagle Forum, and its president, Phyllis Schlafly, who had lobbied for the grant. The executive director of the Task Force on Families in Crisis also serves as the vice-president of the Eagle Forum. Particularly disturbing is the lack of understanding demonstrated by Phyllis Schlafly concerning the realities of violence encountered by women and children in the United States. Schlafly's views in these areas include that "virtuous women are seldom accosted by unwelcome sexual propositions and familiarities . . .," and that the public schools are the primary victimizers of children. In reaction to the findings from the FOIA request, the House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, chaired by Congressman John Conyers, has begun an investigation into this and related Justice Department grants. Congesswoman Patricia Schroeder has also questioned the propriety of grantmaking by the Justice Department to organizations which have opposed the goals of the program. FOIA requester—People For The American Way.

These constitute but a few examples of the vital role that the Freedom of Information Act plays in attacking government secrecy and promoting the public good.

III. ENFORCING THE PUBLIC RIGHT TO INFORMATION IN FEDERAL COURT

The true force given to the presumption of a public right of access to records in federal agencies under the Freedom of Information Act derives from the right to pursue requests in federal court under Section 4*B). The importance of this provision cannot be overstated.

Although critics of the Act, including former Attorney General William French Smith, have alleged that the judicial remedy allows the courts to operate as a floodgate of government information, and unduly burdens the federal courts, statistics demonstrate that the courts have predominantly decided cases in favor of the federal agencies. A recent study documents both the wide public use of its right to pursue disclosure requests in court and the frequency with which the courts have denied plaintiffs their requests.

In a 1986 study of the need to establish an administrative tribunal to resolve the Freedom of Information Act disputes, the report, commissioned by the Administrative Conference of the United States, showed that between 1980 and 1985, 3013 cases were filed by FOIA requesters. However, 92% of the cases were terminated before the pretrial period, 7% reached pre-trial, and only 1% were tried. The report concluded that in cases where the judgement was known, 81.1% of the cases were decided in favor of the federal agencies; only 11.6% favored the requester; 6.7% ruled partially in favor of both requester and agency; and 20.5% of those cases appealed were reversed. (Grunewald, Mark H. A Study of the Desirability and Feasibility of Establishing An Administrative Tribunal To Resolve Freedom of Information and Other Public Access Disputes. The Administrative Conference of the United States, February 25, 1986)

In contrast to the claims of Attorney General Williams French Smith and others, it appears that the enforceable right to pursue FOIA disclosures in federal court is neither abused, unmanageable by the courts, nor a source of unrestrained disclosure of information from federal agencies.

IV. THE DEVELOPMENT OF OPEN INFORMATION LAWS BY STATE GOVERNMENTS

As mentioned in a letter accompanying this report, a second report will be provided in the months ahead which details the open information laws and issues in each state and district. However, an overview of the twenty year history of the Freedom of Information Act would be incomplete without a brief discussion of the development of state laws paralleling the establishment of rights under the under the Freedom of Information Act.

The Freedom of Information Act creates the right of public access to records of executive branch agencies of the federal government, but has absolutely no legal bearing on the disclosure of records belonging to state governments. Since the enactment of the Freedom of Information Act in 1966, however, all states have passed some type of access to information statute.

Approximately one-half of the states have passed laws similar in scope to the federal law. In order words, such laws included three essential elements: (1) presumption of a public right of access to government records, placing the burden of proof to withhold information upon the government; (2) enforceability of this public right in court; and (3) statutory exemptions to disclosure of information.

Among the state laws, the New York and Connecticut statutes are actually as effective as the Freedom of Information Act, because both states establish an oversight body in the executive branch to ensure that the laws are enforced to the fullest extent.

In California, the open information law applies not only to executive branch agencies, but also to local governmental bodies.

The activity among state legislatures in the open information area has intensified in recent years, demonstrating an appreciation by the states of the principles and benefits of the Freedom of Information Act. The adoption of these laws at the state level stands in sharp contract to efforts by the current administration to restrict the scope of federal law. During the past year alone, 40 states passed a total of 197 separate measures, 158 expanded by the scope of existing legislation. Florida, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and New York each passed at least 25 open information bills during the 1985–86 legislative year.

V. THE FUTURE OF THE FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT

The Freedom of Information Act, after twenty years of operation, remains the single statutory mechanism granting an enforceable right of public access to government records. The Act has simultaneously served as an instrument and a symbol of open information in a democratic society. Critics of such policies, however, have focused on the Freedom of Information Act as the source of greater problems in such areas as national security, investigative law enforcement, and government costs.

There is no argument over the importance of matters of national security. There is also no argument over the essential role of investigative law enforcement in our nation. Likewise, it is crucial that all government programs, including implementation of the Freedom of Information Act be well managed and efficient.

However, the Freedom of Information Act, its specific rights, and the related First Amendment rights of free expression, and free and open debate between citizens and their government, must not be minimized. Where legitimate matters of national security and law enforcement, for example, are jeopardized by the Act, factual arguments must be heard as to the need for amendments. However, opponents of the Act must be required to substantiate their claims and not simply attack the Act as a source of a problem orginating elsewhere.

For example, in 1979, FBI Director William Webster alleged that the Freedom of Information Act was being used to undermine investigations by permitting outsiders to identify informants and possibly harm them. Director Webster announced that he was initiating a study within the FBI to prove his allegations, and that he would send the results of the study to Congress to justify his desire to weaken the Freedom of Information Act. In August of 1980, Webster abruptly cancelled the study. Seven thousand FBI agents had been interviewed at this point and the results failed to support Webster's allegations. In fact, the study showed that only 19 informants had refused to cooperate with the FBI due to FOIA disclosure, and no informants had been harmed due to disclosure of information about their work with the FBI. Director Webster never released the study to Congress. The study was finally released to the public through the FOIA request and subsequent report by NBC News reporter Carl Stern.

Another example of unsubstantiated allegations of FOIA misuse was made in 1983 in relation to the issue of national security. On January 5, 1983, Rear Admiral Edward A. Burkhalter Jr., Director of the Intelligence Community Staff, spoke to the Armed Forces Communications Electronics Association.

Rear Admiral Burkhalter stated that the Freedom of Information Act was "one of the more productive means by which the Soviets have acquired large amounts of valuable information in recent years."

A private American citizen reading an account of the Rear Admiral's speech endeavored to learn more about the subject. The citizen contacted all federal agencies related to defense and intelligence seeking to substantiate the allegations of Soviet use of the Freedom of Information Act. The agencies were unable to document a single incident in support of the Rear Admiral's allegations.

Finally, a lawsuit was filed to force the Rear Admiral to disclose evidence supporting his claim. Burkhalter's speechwriter responded to the request stating that the allegation was based on a similar claim made in 1982 by Attorney General William French Smith, and from a 1982 Senate Report on technology transfer to the Soviet bloc. However, when examined, neither source was found to contain more than the same unsubstantiated claims and allegations that FOIA requests were being made by the Soviets.

The significance of these examples is not to argue that national security, or confidentiality of investigative law enforcement should not be addressed within the context of the Freedom of Information Act. Rather, it is to demonstrate the tendency of the critics of the Act to raise the fears of Americans by criticizing the single strongest law granting public access to government information. Neither the Act itself, nor the important rights it grants to Americans should be diminished simply because it stands alone in United States law. Instead, proposed amendments should be carefully balanced with the strengths of the Act, its enormous benefit to American society, and the concerns attendant to reducing public access to information in a democracy.●

NATIONAL FOREST PLANNING IN IDAHO

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, on Wednesday of last week, Senator McCLURE, Congressman CRAIG, and I met with Forest Service Chief Max Peterson and the two regional foresters directly responsible for Idaho National Forest. We requested the meeting because of the trend we see forest planning taking.

Forest Service planning, which eventually dictates the amount and type of use made of National Forest resources, is crucial to the State of Idaho and other Western States. Though focusing on Idaho, I'm convinced that the situation is similar in other Western States. A few basic facts illustrate my concerns. Sixty-eight percent of the land area of Idaho is Federal property. Of this, 20 million acres or 38 percent is national forest land. This Federal land supports about 68 percent of the commercial timber growing in Idaho. Timber supplies from the national forests supply 43 percent of the raw material for Idaho's forest products industry.

Historically, the national forests, as they should, have provided more than half of the timber harvested in Idaho. However, the share of Idaho's timber economy supported by the national forests has been declining steadily. It is a decline from the pre-1980 average of more 50 percent of the States total timber supply to less than 45 percent today. This may seem a minor difference, but it could add up to more than 700 lost jobs in Idaho. This decline is not the result of a shortage of timber. Indeed, national forest timber growth is more than double the annual removals from the forests, both from timber harvesting and natural mortality.

The Forest Service share of Idaho timber harvest has decreased for several reasons. Because of environmental constraints the volume of timber considered available from the national forests has been decreasing. At the same time the cost of harvesting the national forest timber offered for sale has significantly—and sometimes unnecessarily—increased. The basic trend has been accelerated, temporarily perhaps, by the depressed lumber market of the past few years. Much of this depression is the result of a tidal wave of Canadian lumber swamping our industry.

In Idaho, these Federal policies have resulted in increases in State and private timber production to fill the void caused by decreasing national forest sales. However, State and private timber holdings have reached their practical limits of productivity. If Forest Service timber offerings aren't increased, more cut-backs and mill closures are likely to occur in Idaho's forest products industry.

Mr. President, Idaho just can't stand this. Our forest products industry has been the State's second most important industry. In 1979 it provided jobs for more than 19,000 people at an average income of slightly more than $19,000. It should be noted that this was about 50 percent higher than the average income in the State at that time. In the first half of 1985, forest products employment was about 12,350 and the average annual wage for the industry was only $18,600. It's not difficult to trace the industry's decline. I can list, without hesitation, 11 plants that have been closed or curtailed or where the employees have accepted significant wage reductions to keep the doors open.

It's a matter of pride to me and everyone in the industry that actual production was about the same in 1979 and 1985. Our people have just become vastly more productive. These people have gone to the wall to protect their jobs and their communities. Now, it appears that a recovery might be just ahead. But, lumbering in Idaho must survive now if it is to recover later. We cannot have unnecessary constraints on raw material availability. I just can't stand by and see them subjected to further abuse by unnecessary constraints on raw material availability.

The national forest plans are currently being reviewed at the direction of the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, to determine the overall impact on dependent communities. This has never been done before and I commend the Department and the Forest Service. Still, it's strange that while all environmental issues—water quality, big game habitat et cetera—are carefully considered, the impact of Forest Service plans on peoples lives and their jobs are considered only as a nice-to-do courtesy.

I want to emphasize, most clearly, that I'm not urging unreasonable increases in national forest timber harvests in Idaho. One of the alternatives in the current plans would more than meet the industry's wood needs. This alternative would fit within applicable laws and regulations. It would simply shift the emphasis toward jobs and community stability. I support this alternative as being reasonable and responsible.

I'm concerned about the quality of our environment. Everyone is. However, I think having a job and being able to support a family with some security is one of the most basic environmental imperatives. For that reason I'll continue to work to insure that adequate supplies of national forest timber are made available to sustain Idaho jobs and communities.●

PHYSICIAN PAYMENT REVIEW COMMISSION

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, last week during the heat of battle over our important tax reform legislation, another significant victory occurred to the benefit of millions of Americans throughout the Nation. I want to discuss that situation for a few minutes this morning, because it might have been overlooked—and because it is an excellent illustration of what can be accomplished when Members coalesce behind a common goal.

As background, Mr. President, I would point out that health care is big business, and it touches every family in America. Health service expenditures make up nearly 11 percent of the gross national product. In 1984, Americans spent almost $390 billion for health care—approximately $1,400 for every man, woman, and child in the Nation.

We have made some headway in controlling these costs, but not enough. The 1983 reforms in hospital payment have slowed institutional cost increases to just over 6 percent, and reduced much of the uncertainty over reimbursement that plagued finance officers in the early years of the Medicare Program. Yet payments for physician services continue to rise at an alarming rate—10 percent in 1984. And while there have been countless recommendations to redesign physician payment practices, there has simply been no agreement on solutions beyond temporary measures.

The 1985 reconciliation bill signed into law by the President April 7 took what I consider a very positive step by creating an 11-member panel to advise the President and Members of Congress on physician payment reform of the Medicare Program. While this undertaking is of great importance to physicians, and to the elderly and disabled, it is also of very significant interest to the business community and to State and Federal officials who typically consult Medicare fee screens when setting payment rates for other health insurance policies and programs.

However, when Office of Technology Assessment Director John Gibbons recently announced the selection of 11 individuals to serve on the Physicians Payment Review Commission, it was immediately clear that at least two major constituences would not be represented at the negotiating table: Rural America and the group of States that make up the southern region of the Nation.

In response, Majority Leader DOLE and I, together with Senators BURDICK, BAUCUS, and DURENBERGER of the Rural Health Caucus, circulated a letter calling on Director Gibbons to reconsider his decision and open the Commission's membership to a more representative cross section of Americans. More than 30 members of the Senate, from all regions of the country, joined us in this effort.

I am pleased to report that we were able to reach a compromise permitting each of the 11 original members to serve, yet also ensuring representation of rural communities through the appointment of a Commissioner-designate. With the exception of voting, the Commissioner-designate will have all privileges and responsibilities of membership, and will become a full Commission member at the first available opening. While no official commitment to select a southerner has been made, it is my hope that Dr. Gibbons and his staff will correct the problem of geographic imbalance by choosing someone from the southern region as the Commissioner-designate.

I would like to take this opportunity to commend Director Gibbons and his fine staff, particularly Dr. Roger Herdman, for their responsiveness and sensitivity in dealing with our request.

Although we may move to expand the statutory membership of the Commission during the reconciliation process later this year, the immediate creation of a Commissioner-designate position will ensure that the constituencies not represented in the original group will be at the negotiating table from the very beginning of the Commission's deliberations.

Mr. President, over the next 3 to 5 years, we in the Congress will be called upon to make some extremely difficult and far-reaching decisions on the methods and rates used to compensate physicians under federally financed health programs. The recommendations of this Commission will influence our deliberations and affect the quality of the choices we make. I am therefore pleased to be able to report that the 60 million Americans living in rural communities will have a hand in developing those recommendations.

I ask unanimous consent that copies of the correspondence from Rural Health Caucus members to Dr. Gibbons, and Director Gibbons letter of commitment be included in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

The material follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
OFFICE OF TECHNOLOGY ASSESSMENT,
Washington, DC, June 25, 1986.

Hon. LLOYD BENTSEN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR LLOYD: I want to thank you and the other members of the Senate Rural Health Caucus for your letter concerning the composition of the Physician Payment Review Commission. You expressed concern over the lack of explicit representation of rural America on the Commission, and concern that greater effort be given to achieving geographical balance. I agree with you that both concerns are of great importance in creating a balanced Commission. However, as you know, the selection process was very difficult because of the need to represent at least eight legislatively specified areas of expertise within the confines of a Commission of only eleven members.

As you know, we have become very aware of and sensitive to the concerns of the members of the Caucus. After receiving your letter of June 10, Dr. Roger Herdman, OTA Assistant Director for Health and Life Sciences, met several times with Members and staff. As outlined in those discussions, I am confirming our intention to be directly responsive to your concerns by appointing a commissioner-designate representing rural America. The commissioner-designate will be appointed as a full participant in the meetings, deliberations, and other activities of the Commission, but will not have voting privileges. The commissioner-designate will be appointed by me as a full voting member of the Commission when the first opening occurs on the Commission (e.g., either by expansion of the Commission or by expiration of the term of a present commissioner in May 1987).

We look forward to working with the Caucus to assure that an outstanding person will be appointed as commissioner-designate in the near future.

Sincerely,

JOHN H. GIBBONS

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, June 10, 1986.

JOHN GIBBONS, Ph.D.,
Director, Office of Technology Assessment, Washington, DC.

DEAR DR. GIBBONS: It has come to our attention that you are prepared to release the names of eleven individuals selected by the Director of the Office of Technology Assessment to serve on the newly created Physician Payment Review Commission (PhysPRC).

We are deeply disappointed to learn, however, that there will be no representative of rural America on this panel. We are also dismayed at the lack of geographic balance among the persons selected to serve.

As members of the Senate Rural Health Caucus, we represent both political parties and all regions of the country. But we share one goal, to improve access to quality health care for the nearly sixty million individuals who live in rural communities.

All too often rural America is overlooked by those responsible for national health care policy. Yet fully one quarter of the elderly reside in communities where access to care is contingent on the willingness of physicians to practice in sparsely populated areas.

The purpose of PhysPRC, as defined in P.L. 99-272, the Consolidated Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1985, is to make recommendations to the Secretary of Health and Human Services, and to the Congress regarding payment for physician services. The statute explicitly requires that those recommendations take into account "differences in payment amounts for physicians' services . . . which are based on differences in geographic location or specialty." Physicians best able to represent this perspective are those who live and work in small communities.

We therefore urge you to reconsider your decision and include a rural physician on this panel. Moreover, we believe the Secretary and Members of Congress would be better served by a Commission whose membership includes all regions of the country. Thank you for your attention to our request.

NAUM AND INNA MEIMAN: FREEDOM DENIED

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, in 1 week our country will be celebrating the Fourth of July holiday. Throughout the United States families will be celebrating Independence Day and their freedom. During "Liberty Weekend" there will be many festivities and events highlighted by the relighting ceremony of the Statue of Liberty.

My friends, Naum and Inna Meiman, cannot enjoy the freedoms many of us take for granted in this country. The Meimans are Soviet Jews who have applied to emigrate to Israel and have been refused for over 10 years. They are an elderly, ailing couple. They would like to spend what time they have, together, in Israel, but the Soviet Government continues to deny them this right. The Meimans pose no threat to the Soviet Government and should be allowed to choose their own home.

The Soviets gain only negative publicity by refusing to grant a couple like the Meimans permission to emigrate. By releasing the Meimans, they could demonstrate that they are concerned about human dignity and human rights.

I commend my colleagues to remember those who are not in our fortunate positions as we celebrate our freedoms and liberties on July Fourth.

I strongly urge the Soviets to allow the Meimans to emigrate to Israel.●

HUMAN RIGHTS IN NICARAGUA

● Mr. HARKIN. On June 17, Senators PATRICK LEAHY, PAUL SIMON, and DENNIS DECONCINI joined me in holding informal hearings on human rights in Nicaragua. We took the unusual step of calling this informal hearing because the human rights issue has not been fully addressed by the Senate or the administration.

As Congress prepares to reconsider the administration's request for $100 million in aid to the Contras, we will spend much time discussing the Contadora process, the Nicaraguan arms buildup, and now, a new element of the debate, Contra corruption.

Too little attention has been spent on what I believe should serve as the foundation of our Nicaragua policy—human rights. Unfortunately, the debate that has occurred on this issue has focused more on the personalities and reputations of human rights groups than on the content of their reports.

Over the past decade, Congress has firmly established in law the principle that the United States should deny aid to governments which engage in gross violations of human rights. There has also been written into international law rules governing armed conflict for civilized nations.

Both standards should be applied to the Contras.

We have a long and proud tradition of holding ourselves to a higher moral principle in the conduct of our foreign policy. We must not use as an instrument of that policy forces which systematically practice torture, kidnapings, and murder.

Before defining our overall policy toward Nicaragua, we need to focus not only on the human rights record of the Contras, but also on that of the Nicaraguan Government. For this reason, this hearing will focus on the full range of human rights violations, including arbitrary detention and treatment of the Miskitos, as well as violations of the laws of war.

I have long believed that human rights should serve as the bedrock of American foreign policy. This informal hearing was a first step toward ensuring that that standard is applied to U.S. policy in Nicaragua.

THE PANELISTS

The witnesses testifying at the June 17 hearing were from organizations which represent the full range of views on this topic, and which provided an objective assessment of the human rights situation in Nicaragua.

The first two witnesses represented the Washington Office on Latin America. Robert Goldman is a professor of international law at American University, and a member of the boards of WOLA, Americas Watch, and the International Human Rights Law Group. Mary Dutcher is a graduate of St. Louis University, and former assistant attorney general for the State of Missouri. In 1984, she became a member of the long term of Witness for Peace and in November 1985, she took a leave of absence from Witness for Peace to prepare the WOLA report on Violations of the Laws of War by both sides of the conflict in Nicaragua.

Speaking on behalf of Amnesty International was Curt Goering. Mr. Goering is the Deputy Director of the U.S. Section of Amnesty. He previously worked for 5 years as coordinator within the Washington office on Europe, the Middle East, the Soviet Union, and Africa. Appearing with Mr. Goering was Rhona Weitz, who is responsible for Latin American issues for Amnesty International.

The fourth witness, Mr. Douglas Payne, is assistant to the director of the Center for Caribbean and Central American Studies of Freedom House. He has written on Central America for "Freedom at Issue, Strategic Review," and other publications.

Speaking for Americas Watch was Aryeh Neier, vice chairman and executive director of the organization. He is currently vice chairman of Helsinki and Asia Watch, and previously served as executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

The final witness was Steve Tullberg, a staff attorney with the Indian Law Resource Center. He has worked in the field of Indian law for over 8 years. The center has worked closely with Misurasata, the Nicaraguan Indian organization headed by Brooklyn Rivera. Mr. Tullberg accompanied Brooklyn Rivera during his official trip to Nicaragua in October 1984, and since May 1985, he has been involved in several unsuccessful efforts to reopen negotiations to end the Indian war on Nicaragua's Atlantic coast.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the written statements of the panelists be printed in the RECORD. I am also enclosing for the RECORD the statement of Senator LEAHY. Following the remarks from the Senator from Vermont is a written statement on the problem of Contra abuses submitted by several of his constituents.

The material follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR PATRICK J. LEAHY DURING INFORMAL HEARINGS ON VIOLATIONS OF THE LAWS OF WAR IN NICARAGUA

Congress will soon again be asked to resume support for the contras fighting the Sandinista government of Nicaragua. One of the key factors that has prevented congressional approval is the continuing series of highly credible reports that the contras have engaged in numerous human rights abuses, including impermissible violence and even atrocities.

The Administration has based its policy of support to the contras on its charges against the Sandinistas. These include Sandinistas-supported subversion in Central America, their military build-up, and consolidation of a Marxist-Leninist state which is suppressing civil rights.

The subversive activities and other security threats are said to justify U.S. support for the contras as an exercise of self-defense. But—regardless of the other problems with this theory—no such acts of international self-defense could possibly be valid if they were based on systematic or regular violations of the laws of war, which are the fundamental laws of armed conflict for civilized nations.

Despite consistent troubling reports from the field, and the research of creditable independent organizations, the Administration has tried to minimize the issue of serious human rights abuses. But this issue is a fundamental one which must be considered by every moral person before deciding whether the contras merit our support.

I have described in much greater length elsewhere (floor statement of February 26, 1986, see Congressional Record of that day) my conclusions on this issue. But it is all-too-clear that the Administration has yet to face it.

First, the Administration has never responded credibly to the numerous well-documented charges which have been made, or to the conclusion which must otherwise be made on the basis—that the contras have engaged in routine, even systematic, violent abuses of human rights.

Second, the Administration has apparently never tried to get to the truth of this matter. As Vice Chairman of the Intelligence Committee, I raised the issue with the CIA early last year. I was astounded to learn, in the response of the CIA itself (letter from the Acting Director, March 29, 1985), that the resulting study was their "first comprehensive look at the subject, and [that] previous analysis has dealt with abuses only in passing."

Third, the Administration has not responded to numerous attempts to pursue this issue and resolve it. For example, on March 13, 1986—at a hearing of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee—Secretary Shultz promised that he would send Assistant Secretary Abrams to meet with me prior to the next vote on this issue, which was then expected in March. Mr. Abrams has still not followed up on this commitment.

There has also been incomplete examination of this issue by the Senate. There have to my knowledge never been full hearings on this issue of contra human rights abuses held by any Senate committee. From time to time, there have been informal explorations of this issue, such as the one we are engaged in today.

The failure of either the White House or the Senate to face up to this issue is why we are here today. We are fortunate to have had the benefit of the independent efforts of numerous private organizations with excellent reputations.

Today we have represented here the views of several of the organizations that have contributed most effectively and responsibly in this area. In addition, we are fortunate to have a range of views represented so that there can be full exploration of the facts as well as their significance for U.S. policy in Central America.

The issue of human rights violations and atrocities in Nicaragua is of intense concern to many of my constituents in Vermont. Some have gotten together and sent me a statement about the problem of abuses by contra forces, including accounts based on first-hand witnesses. I plan to include that statement in the record of this hearing today.

TWO NICARAGUAN JOURNEYS

(By Roddy O'Neil Cleary, Campus Ministry, University of Vermont)

I'm a Vermonter, a mother of two teenage sons and foster mother of a Cambodian teenage daughter. My first trip to Nicaragua was in February of 1984. I went for two reasons. First because I had heard of atrocities being committed against women and children by counter-revolutionaries who were being funded by my country. As a women this made me sick and angry. Secondly I felt strongly as a mother that it was incumbent upon me to work for peace in Central America before my sons were sent there to militarily "defend democracy." The more I studied the history of U.S. intervention in Latin America over the past fifty years, the more clearly it seemed that this history was repeating itself in Nicaragua.

My second trip to Nicaragua was in February of '86. As in '84, I travelled with a dozen other Vermonters, who had religious affiliations and were committed to working for justice and peace with our Nicaraguan brothers and sisters. In my work as a campus minister at the University of Vermont, I have been inspired by the student concern over issues relating to Central America. This active concern was instrumental in my decision to return to Nicaragua.

On both trips the stories of Contra atrocities were confirmed by first hand experiences. In February of '84 I visited with a mother and family in Teotecacinte, a Nicaraguan border town between Honduras and Nicaragua. The mother told of how her little four year old daughter's head was blown off by a Contra mortar shell.

On Feb. 21st of '86, I visited a thirteen year old girl in intensive care at the hospital in Leon. Her name was Pilar Betanco Castillo. She was one of approximately sixteen victims of a Contra attack that occurred outside the town of Somotillo on Feb. 16th. Our group had heard about the massacre the following day as we gathered at Ocatal to participate in a religious pilgrimage. This was a pilgrimage that had its counterpart throughout Nicaragua, during the first two weeks of Lent.

It was from this pilgrimage that Pilar was returning when the pick-up truck carrying her was ambushed by Contras. All the passengers in the truck were unarmed civilians, women and children. It was driven by a dedicated Swiss agricultural worker, Maurice Demierre. He was beloved by the campesinos for his effective work in organizing farm cooperatives.

The Contras killed Maurice plus five women and children. Nine persons were wounded. Our Vermont group visited the hospitalized victims in an effort to make some reparation for the terrible suffering and death caused by our administration's policy in Nicaragua.

Standing beside Pilar, who was immobilized by shrapnel in her spine and a metal brace riveted into her skull, I thought of my own thirteen year old in Vermont. Pilar's agony is still with me, even though she died a month or so ago.

From my experience of living with and listing to Nicaraguan campesinos, I am convinced that my country supports terrorism and is a scandal to the world community. As a woman I vow to do everything in my power to change the immoral policy that is responsible for the deaths of over 15,000 Nicaraguans over the past four years.

STATEMENT OF MARY DUTCHER, ESQ.

Good afternoon. My name is Mary Dutcher. I am the attorney who authored WOLA's 1985 Report, "Nicaragua: Violations of the Laws of War by Both Sides" and the first Supplement to that Report, which was published yesterday, covering the first three months of 1986.

Prof. Goldman has done an excellent job of explaining the applicable law. The purpose of the Report and Supplement is to document the extent of compliance by both sides with the standards set forth in that law.

Both documents reveal that a prima facie case has been established of gross violations of the laws of war by contra forces that continued during the first three months of 1986. Although not pretending to be quantitative, both documents are illustrative of the conduct of the war in Nicaragua. Of that 41 incidents documented in the Supplement, 35 are attributable to the counterrevolutionary insurgents. These violations include 21 kidnappings involving 104 persons; 11 murders; 6 indiscriminate attacks resulting in the deaths of 13 civilians; 2 attempted summary executions; 1 case of threatening behavior; 3 violations of the rights of the wounded and sick resulting in 54 deaths; and 4 cases of outrage against personal dignity (2 cases of mutilation and 2 cases of rape—one involving 15 women and the other involving 2 women). These are incidents that occurred in the first three months of 1986.

There are six documented violations by the Nicaraguan armed forces, which include 5 indiscriminate attacks resulting in the deaths of 12 civilians and 1 case of threatening behavior. There was no evidence to conclude that the Nicaraguan armed forces engage in a systematic pattern of violations of the laws of war.

On Good Friday (March 28, 1986), Gregorio Ruiz Borge was taken out of house by counterrevolutionary forces to be summarily executed. He believes his work coordinating the community volunteers putting up a fence around a school that United States citizens had built was the reason for what happened to him. He was stabbed in the neck three times, but somehow survived to provide one of the 71 sworn statements on which the Supplement is based.

Another 3 of the sworn statements relate to an incident in January, when about 15 women were raped by insurgents on the Atlantic Coast. One of them, herself a Miskito Indian, states, "Two men raped me. It was about two in the morning. They did this all in front of all the other women and children that were in the house. I started to cry because they did this to me in front of all these people."

On February 16, Maurice Demierre, a Swiss agronomist, and five other unarmed women were killed when the pickup that DeMierre was driving was ambushed. That incident is documented by 3 sworn statements of passengers in the pickup, as well as by a communique from nongovernmental organizations working in Nicaragua.

Nicaraguan armed forces, including both the army and the militia, were involved in five incidents of indiscriminate attack against civilian targets. Two of the sworn statements detail an incident in February in Matagalpa where 4 Nicaraguan soldiers opened fire on a family, leaving a father and his three grown sons dead, and wounding the mother and her young nephew.

The 41 incidents documented in the Supplement occurred in the first three months of 1986. The 1985 Report documents an additional 139 such incidents that occurred from February through December of 1985, 21 attributable to the Nicaraguan armed forces and 118 attributable to the counterrevolutionary forces.

I would like to go into some detail about the methodology used in the investigation because one of the important aspects of the Report and the Supplement is the extensive on-site knowledge on which they are grounded. Investigators were trained in the laws of war that Prof. Goldman has explained to us, as well as in investigative techniques and how to take a sworn statement. I drew on my experience as Attorney in Charge of the St. Louis Office of the Missouri Attorney General, where we conducted many investigations, in the training of investigators.

The investigators, mostly members of the long term team of Witness for Peace, for the most part lived in the war zones and, after their training, returned and took sworn statements from eyewitnesses or victims about incidents that were common knowledge in their communities. Others—such as the professional photographer and the bee keeper—travelled to various parts of Nicaragua. I travelled also, both spot checking the incidents reported by the investigators and going to areas where no investigators lived, such as Wiwili (on the border between the Departments of Nueva Segovia and Jinotega) and Waslala and Siuna, in Zelaya. One 60 mile stretch of road on the way to Waslala has had more than 40 ambushes in the last two years, so the local people say.

I am going into some detail because the type of violation that is the subject of this report is one that occurs usually in the countryside. Most of the human rights reporting about Nicaragua does not primarily address the violations of the laws of war—these incidents of kidnapping, rape, murder of civilians, mutilation, indiscriminate attack—because they do not occur in the cities, where there is infrastructure to report them. They occur in remote places in the countryside. As a result, many go unreported.

For example, at the beginning of the 1985 Report, I went to the Permanent Commission on Human Rights, a critic of the Nicaraguan government, to ask for cases of Nicaraguan army violations of the laws of war. Although they generously cooperated and opened their files, we found that they contained very few violations of the laws of war. Of the 21 Nicaraguan armed forces violations in the 139 incidents documented in the 1985 Report, only 4 were on file at the Permanent Commission. The other 17 came to light in the field. Similarly with this Supplement: the monthly publications of the Permanent Commission for January and February of 1986 contained only one possible case of violations of the laws of war. All of the 6 Nicaraguan armed forces violations were discovered in the field. The primary value of this Supplement, then, is the verifiable information it offers about the actual conduct of the war in the countryside of Nicaragua.

I have noted one alarming trend that I hope does not reflect a change in policy since beginning the investigation for the Supplement in 1986. It has to do with the increasing disrespect by the counterrevolutionary insurgents for the lives of foreign nationals doing humanitarian work in Nicaragua. Beginning with the death of Maurice DeMierre, a Swiss agronomist, in February near Somotillo, Chinandega (reported in the Supplement), there have been other incidents of aggression against foreign nationals. Although I do not yet have sworn statements on these incidents, there is no doubt that they happened; and they reveal an alarming pattern. They include, besides DeMierre's death in February, the kidnapping of 8 unarmed West German construction workers on May 18 near Nueva Guinea, Zelaya (released after 25 days of captivity); and the killing of a male nurse from Spain, Ambrosio Mogorron, and 8 other members of a health team doing polio vaccinations by a land mine near San Jose de Bocay on May 24.

The other point that needs to be emphasized is that there is no sign that the pattern of gross violations by counterrevolutionary forces is changing. I recall the three weeks in May before I left Nicaragua as being particularly bloody and, although I have not yet obtained sworn statements about the following incidents, there is no doubt that they occurred;

*May 3, 1986. Quibuto, a resettlement area for persons displaced by the war located near San Juan de Rico Coco in Madriz, was attacked by contra forces who kidnapped 8 civilians, including a teacher, and a brother and sister aged 13 and 15. The troops also burned down 14 houses and 5 public buildings, including the health center and food storage warehouse.

*May 11, 1986. Around 11 p.m. at night, 6 contras entered the home of 12 year old Ruth Maria Sequeira in Las Santos, near Nueva Guinea in Zelaya, and killed her mother and 10 year old brother. In the firing and shooting before the soldiers entered the house, Ruth was shot in the foot and shrapnel hit two of her siblings, Jose Maria (age 5) and Pablo Jose (age 2), wounding him in the chest.

*May 17, 1986. Three Housing Ministry Workers were killed when their Toyota pickup, the first in a caravan of 14 construction trucks, hit a land mine at Sompopera in Jinotega. Sompopera is the same location where an anti-tank mine was detected and deactivated just before a bus full of 60 persons was to ride over it in January of 1986 (described in the Supplement). It should be noted that the violation consists in the placement of such "blind" weapons that cannot distinguish between civilian and military targets and that give no warning.

*May 18, 1986. 8 unarmed West German volunteer construction workers, 4 men and 4 women, were kidnaped from the Jacinto Haca cooperative 20 miles northeast of Nueva Guinea, Zelaya, where they had been helping to build housing for the peasants of the cooperative. They were released in mid-June, after 25 days of captivity, one seriously ill with hepatitis.

*May 20, 1986. 2 cooperatives at Mireflores, 17 miles northeast of Esteli, were attacked. Among the 8 people killed were three children, which may or may not have been a violation, depending on the particular circumstances. The contra forces destroyed 14 houses and 2 warehouses. They also burned down the one school in the area.

*May 24, 1986. A health worker from Spain and 8 other members of a health team doing polio vaccinations were killed by a land mine near San Jose de Bocay in Jinotega.

All of the 268 sworn statements that form the basis of WOLA's 1985 Report and its First Supplement are on file at the Washington Office on Latin America and contain information designed to facilitate verification by independent investigators. I invite and encourage others to investigate for themselves the compliance by both sides with the laws of war in Nicaragua.

"HUMAN RIGHTS IN NICARAGUA"

(Presentation by Douglas W. Payne)

On October 10, 1980, fifteen months after the fall of the Somoza, Sandinista Interior Minister and founding member Tomas Borge addressed the visiting Inter-American Commission on Human Rights of the OAS. He began his presentation this way—"The most important thing is our historic, strategic decision to be in favor of human rights."[1] This admission, in one of Borge's renowned moments of candor, that the Sandinistas commitment to human rights was the result of a strategic decision, reveals exactly the relationship between the Sandinista political-military organization and the concept of human rights.

The question then becomes—when and why did the Sandinistas make such a strategic decision—what is the nature and the goal of that strategy—and how is it translated in the condition of human rights in Nicaragua today?

The professed goal of every armed revolutionary group in Latin America since Castro has been the seizure of power. But following Fidel's success came years of failure—rural insurgencies defeated throughout the 1960s, urban guerrillas suppressed in the early 1970s, the Sandinistas themselves nearly crushed, first at Rio Coco in 1963 and again at Pancasan in 1967. Little popular support, powerful military regimes, and a poor image in a region historically adverse to the Marxist-Leninist way. Che's foco and the Tupamaro urban cells were shelved by most sane theoreticians.

However, the 1970s saw the emergence of human rights as a central issue in international affairs, especially in the Latin American wing of the Roman Catholic Church, and then in the foreign policy of the Carter administration. In Latin America a new generation of priests found in socialist theory a rationale for securing the rights of the oppressed in this world, instead of preparing for salvation in the next. Following the electoral ascendancy of Allende Marxism in Chile, Fidel timed his visit to Santiago to address a hemispheric conference of these priests, and declared them to be "strategic allies of the revolution."[2]

A number of these priests were Nicaraguan. The Sandinistas, rebuilding after the 1960s, began to successfully recruit them on the basis of a shared concerned for the oppressed, of which there was no shortage in Somoza's Nicaragua.

So, while the Sandinista cadres were receiving ideological training in Cuba and at Patrice Lumumba University in Moscow, and military training in North Korea and at PLO camps in the Middle East, their strategic allies in the Church became secret members of the Sandinista Front. The strategy was to isolate Somoza in the new Western climate of human rights concern. The Sandinista solidarity networks in Latin America, Europe, and the United States expanded through the advertisement of Somoza's crimes, which were indeed real, and the Sandinistas were endorsed by a mantle of Christianity, an excellent cover for a small armed Leninst contingent in search of wider support. The goal of the strategic decision mentioned by Tomas Borge was to broaden support among non-Marxists through strategic political deception.

In 1977, a Nicaraguan Jesuit priest, Fernando Cardenal, appeared before a U.S. Congressional committee to denounce the murder of innocent civilians by the Somoza regime, and to read a list of names of those killed. What was not known at the time was that Cardenal was a full member of the Sandinista Front, the FSLN, and that his testimony was based not on Church investigations but written for him by the Sandinista National Directorate. Furthermore, the names of the innocent civilians were actually peasant collaborators of the armed Sandinista cells. Cardenal confirmed this deception in a 1983 interview published by Orbis Books, the Maryknoll publishing house.[3]

In a December 1984 interview in FSLN party newspaper Barricada, Cardenal revealed how in late 1976 he was summoned to a safehouse in southern Nicaragua by Comandante Eduardo Contreras of the FSLN National Directorate.[4] Contreras, who'd overseen the building of an arms pipeline through Mexico and Honduras with the assistance of the Cuban DGI, gave Cardenal a double-bottom suitcase containing documents to smuggle out of the country. Cardenal took them to Costa Rica where they were edited by Comandante Luis Carrion, and novelist and secret FSLN member Sergio Ramirez. Cardenal read these documents before the Congressional Committee. When members of the committee asked him who he represented he told them "I am here in the name of the barefoot lowly peasants of Nicaragua." [5]

Meanwhile, two other Nicaraguan priests, Ernesto Cardenal and Miguel D'Escoto, both secret members of the Front, toured the U.S., Europe, and Latin America to boost the FSLN-run solidarity committees, spearhead fundraising, and portray revolution as the only hope for a return to human rights in Nicaragua. These committees were to eventually channel tens of millions of Church and private dollars into a bank account in Costa Rica in the name of Ernesto Cardenal. The FSLN translated these dollars into arms.

It might also be noted that during the 1970s Maurice Bishop, leader of the budding Marxist-Leninist New Jewel Movement in Grenada was also enhancing his image and obscuring his real intent by organizing and heading in 1976 the Grenada Council for Human Rights to denounce the brutalities of the Eric Gairy regime.[6]

In 1977 the Sandinistas institutionalized the concept of strategic political deception in a new, internal Political-Military Platform.[7] The document was a blueprint for how a Marxist-Leninist vanguard of less than 200 could galvanize an entire nation, with international support, to rise up in insurrection. The strategy was to build tactical alliances with all sectors of Nicaraguan society in order to isolate Somoza and the National Guard. The method was to obscure the FSLN's goal, stated in the 1977 document, of a Marxist-Leninist state beneath the gloss of Christianity, nationalism, social democracy, and advocacy for human rights. This 2-tiered strategy becomes evident if you compare the secret 1977 Platform with the public program issued by the FSLN in 1978.[8] The 1978 program, the top tier if you will, would form the basis a year later of the government program recognized by the OAS when it called for the removal of Somoza. This program proclaimed the FSLN's adherence to the principles of political pluralism, a mixed economy, and non-alignment, principles the Sandinistas continue to proclaim today.

By December 1979 Somoza was completely isolated in Nicaragua and the Western World. A full-scale and decisive insurrection was six months away and the Sandinistas had the steering wheel. Humberto Ortega was able to tell his commanders in the field—"Without slogans of Marxist orthodoxy, without ultra-leftist phrases such as 'power only for the workers,' 'toward the dictatorship of the proletariat,' etc., we have been able—without losing at any time our revolutionary Marxist-Leninist Sandinista identify—to rally all the people around the FSLN." [9]

The 5-person Junta that replaced Somoza in July 1979 was the final broad front deception that ensured Sandinista hegemony in the new government.[10] It had been agreed, by all parties, that the Junta would rule by decree, by a majority vote of its members, until elections were held. The Junta appeared to include only one Marxist. In actuality 3 of its members—Daniel Ortega, Sergio Ramirez, and Moises Hassan were all members of the FSLN vanguard. This vanguard, led by a nine-man National Directorate, consisted in 1979 of less than 500 ideologically sound cadres. But through the Junta, and by decree, the National Directorate of the FSLN was able to consolidate complete state and military control within one year.

It is important to note that the sophisticated synthesis of guerrilla warfare and broad-front techniques that produced the Sandinista victory was elevated as a hemispheric model by the Cuban Communist Party. At a conference of Latin American communists and revolutionary groups held in Havana in 1982 Manuel Pineiro, chief of the Americas Department of the Cuban Party invoked Lenin to emphasize that the FSLN's success came through "taking advantage of any, even the smallest opportunity of winning a mass ally, even though this ally is temporary, vacillatory, unstable, unreliable and unconditional." [11]

It is no coincidence that when Nidia Diaz, one of the FMLN guerrilla comandantes in El Salvador, was captured last year, documents she was carrying revealed that the FMLN also incorporates broadfront deception in its strategic line, with a special emphasis on human rights. One document describes the existence of an internal human rights front whose task is to promote among outside observers specific human rights issues that would enhance the FMLN's military capability. For instance, it was stressed that the issue of civilian deaths during Salvadoran Air Force bombing was paramount for promotion because the bombing was the most effective tactic against FMLN military operations and had to be defused.[12]

Meanwhile, back in Nicaragua, 1979. The nation celebrates. There will be elections, political pluralism, and respect for human rights and freedoms, just as it stated in the Statute on Rights and Guarantees agreed upon by all sectors of the anti-Somoza alliance. However, in October, three months later, the less than 500 cadres of the FSLN assembled in Managua to receive instructions from the National Directorate. These instructions are in a document called Analysis of the Situation and Tasks of the Sandinista People's Revolution. This document, now commonly referred to as the 72-hour-document, is the hidden tier of the next stage, the consolidation stage, of the Sandinista 2-tiered strategy. The Statute on Rights and Guarantees is the top tier, the mask.[13]

Examination of the 72-hour-document reveals it to be a declaration of class war. The goals of the FSLN are stated to be the consolidation of FSLN power in a revolutionary state, and the building of a Leninist party and a politically trained party army to ensure that power. It is acknowledged that because of this policy, counterrevolution is inevitable, and that a massive, politically trained party militia will also have to be created. It was further acknowledged that the FSLN revolutionary line would determine an inevitable clash with non-Marxist governments and especially the United States. For this reason, the document states that the FSLN will continue to submerge its actual program beneath a public adherence to the principles of political pluralism, mixed economy, respect for human rights and freedoms, and international nonalignment. It was planned that the appeal of the mask, including concrete tactics like enthusiastic participation in intergovernmental organizations and human rights forums, would make believers of enough of the western democracies and certain sectors of the United States, especially the churches, to isolate the U.S. government that would inevitably become adversarial as real FSLN policy began to wink through the facade.

Within the first year of the revolution of the FSLN National Directorate, through its control of the Junta, issued over 500 decrees that gave the FSLN complete control over all repressive and policy-making sectors of the state. It restructured the Council of State to give itself a rubber stamp majority. It announced that elections would not take place until 1985, and that they would not be held to decide who holds power in Nicaragua. It signed a party-to-party agreement with the Soviet Communist Party and subsequently announced the goal of enlarging the Sandinista army to 50,000 men equipped with the most modern military hardware available. It began building a Sandinista People's Militia with a projected target of 300,000 members, to be armed after political training. It took control of all mass media with the exception of one newspaper. It set up a national system of Sandinista Defense Committee modeled on the Revolutionary Defense Committee in Cuba. And it declared that opposition to FSLN policy would be tolerated "as long as it is within the rules of the new system we are constructing." [14] the party in preparation for fusing it with the structures of the state. The projected goal was 50,000 cadres by 1985. That has been reached. The burgeoning FSLN-controlled mass organizations were the pool from which they were drawn. Candidates undergo a 3-stage Leninist integration process that takes two to three years. The continued espousal of political pluralism, a mixed economy and human rights, however, was becoming for most sectors of the former anti-Somoza alliance un engano, a hoax. It was the word they used when they resigned their positions in protest, were forced out, or driven into exile by smear campaigns in the Sandinista controlled media.

The Permanent Commission on Human Rights, established in 1977 and instrumental in exposing the crimes of Somoza and protecting the rights of Sandinista prisoners, began to report on abuses by Sandinista State Security in suppressing the groundswell of opposition. As during Somoza, it investigated disappearances, political prisoners, arbitrary detention, the increasing restrictions on political and press freedoms, and the abuses of a parallel judicial system controlled by the FSLN.

In mid-1980 the Sandinistas countered by creating its own human rights body—the National Commission for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights. The strategy of creating FSLN-controlled parallel organizations in order to undercut and eventually eliminate independent ones had already been evident in the labor and professional fields, and in the emergency of the so-called People's Church. As an arm of the Foreign Ministry, the National Commission was from the outset an advocate and defender of the Sandinista's public adherence to human rights.

In early 1981, Jose Esteban Gonzales, national coordinator of the independent Permanent Commission, reported to the Pope in Europe that about 800 people had disappeared or been killed for political reasons during the first months of the revolution, that the Sandinistas were holding between six and eight thousand political prisoners. State Security immediately occupied the Permanent Commission office on Managua. It was turned inside out and all the files photocopied. When Gonzalez returned from Europe he was arrested and charged with violating public security law in making the accusations in Rome. After protest by various international organizations, he was released. Detained again two days later he managed to flee the country through the Venezuelan Embassy.

Since that time the Permanent Commission has functioned under duress, its office and personnel attacked by mobs directed by the Interior Ministry, its access to paper and printing restricted. Last month the Commission was verbally informed that any report or publication in 1986 must first undergo prior censorship by the Interior Ministry. The Ministry in its oral statement (the order was not delivered in writing) said the penalty would be severe but did not specify. The Commission is deciding this weekend whether to challenge or not publish.

By the end of the second year of the revolution Nicaragua was polarized—two distinct and divergent lines—just as the internal Sandinista documents on class struggle had projected. On the one side the FSLN, in control of the government and rapidly expanding its army, militia and security apparatus with East Bloc assistance, as well as its mass organizations and party structure within the state. In counterpoint, there had emerged a broad opposition—disjointed, but as wide-ranging as the alliance that ousted Somoza. It included the private business sector, the Permanent Human Rights Commission, an array of political parties from center-left to center right, the independent labor unions, newspaper La Prensa, professional groups, the traditional Catholic Church, and the Miskito Indian population on the Atlantic Coast. The Miskitos, virtually left alone by the Somozas, were rebelling against the Cuban personnel that had arrived in the first year to restructure their culture and economy.

In early 1981 State Security arrested the principle Indian leaders and three to four thousand Miskitos fled to Honduras. That spring, opposition efforts to hold rallies were violently disrupted by government-controlled mobs which also attacked the La Prensa office forcing it to shut down for two days. A few months later, at the second anniversary celebration of the revolution, Daniel Ortega clarified the issue, stating that FSLN policy was "dictated by the people. We are not going to go on discussing the rules of the game. The people set the rules of the game, and he who wishes can play them, and he who does not can leave or the people will crush him." [15]

It should be noted that during these first two years the U.S. provided $118 million in outright donations to Nicaragua, more than it had given during the entire Somoza period, and supported an average of $12 million per month in new lines of credit from the World Bank and the Inter-American Development Bank. The U.S. stopped aid after the Sandinistas provided military and logistical assistance to the Salvadoran guerrillas during their failed 1981 offensive. It should also be noted that in August 1981, Assistant Secretary of State Thomas Enders offered to renew aid, support Nicaragua through mutual regional security arrangements, and not support the few hundred former National Guardsmen that were preparing an insurgency from Honduras. In exchange the Sandinistas would only have to cease support for the Salvadoran guerrillas and reduce their armed forces. The Sandinistas ignored the offer. It was not until four months after that the United States decided to give covert assistance to the small, poorly equipped group in Honduras.

1982 and 1983 were key years in the Sandinista strategic attitude toward human rights. Their massive ongoing resettlement, begun in 1981, of nearly a third of the Miskito Indian population came to light in the international press—hundreds of disappearances, burned villages, forced marches to detention camps, thousands fleeing to Honduras and Costa Rica. The Sandinistas claimed it was for their own protection against external aggression. It should be noted, however, that the Miskitos as well as the Black Creole population had been rebelling against Sandinista policy and Cuban presence since 1980, that 3,000 Miskitos had already fled, and that a full-scale uprising seemed imminent. Also it should be remembered, that in the history of the hemisphere there was only one other case of massive forced resettlement of indigenous populations and it was occurring simultaneously in Guatemala, under severe international protest, where the military regime was confronting nearly 10,000 armed guerrillas whose command center was in Nicaragua.

After an on-site investigation in 1982, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights determined that the forced resettlement violated the rights of the Indians under the American Convention on Human Rights, of which Nicaragua is signatory to, that it was carried out and continued to be carried out in an atmosphere of fear and severe conflict, and that prior to the resettlement a considerable number of Indians had been executed.[16]

Also in 1982, March, the Sandinistas installed a state of emergency which suspended all constitutional guarantees including habeas corpus. All non-Sandinista political activity was outlawed and all non-Sandinista media, essentially La Prensa and the Catholic Church radio station, were subjected to prior censorship. The measures were taken in response to the blowing of two bridges near the Honduran border by what the Sandinistas referred to as the contras, short for counterrevolutionaries. The name stuck. At the time the contras still numbered in the hundreds.

What must be acknowledged is that the state of Emergency merely formalized measures the Sandinistas were already taking against a broad domestic and peaceful opposition. The Permanent Human rights Commission and opposition spokesmen argued that the measures were political and took their case to international human rights forums. After nearly three years of receiving the benefit of the doubt, the treatment of the Miskito Indians and the State of Emergency placed the Sandinista's human rights policy under deep scrutiny.

As reports of disappearances continued throughout 1982, among the Latino as well as Miskito population, the Sandinistas were forced to respond to an increasing number of inquiries from both private and inter-governmental rights groups. In December Tomas Borge created a secret Special Investigations Commission inside the Interior Ministry. Its task was to thoroughly and honestly investigate the missing persons cases that the Inter-American Commission was inquiring about. The results of the investigations were to go solely to Borge.

Alvaro Jose Baldizon was named by Borge as chief investigator on this Commission. Last year, after two and a half years, Baldizon defected. He has passed numerous lie detector tests, and has been interviewed by major media and human rights groups. He charges that 90 percent of the accusations received from the Inter-American Commission were true, that the Sandinista government employs a policy of systematic execution against Miskito Indians and political opposition figures. He said he personally investigated and corroborated around 300 cases. He charges that the executions are carried out by a national network of specially trained secret teams directed by Tomas Borge and Interior Vice Minister Luis Carrion. The program is called "special measures." Borge wanted each case alleged by an international organization investigated internally in order to prepare plausible denial. For instance, executions that took place in northern Nicaragua, and where most of the accusations were aimed, were routinely explained as contra killings.[17]

To date Baldizon's testimony has been denied and his identity questioned by only the Sandinista government. Within days of Baldizon's defection his brother and wife were arrested. His wife is currently under house arrest and his brother's whereabouts are unknown. It should also be noted that two defectors from State Security testified in Costa Rica, months before Baldizon's defection, that they were aware of government directed executions.[18] And Jorge

Alaniz Pinell, the former Director of Planning in the government Reconstruction Fund who left Nicaragua in 1983, has charged in a recent book published in Panama that he was also aware of such executions.[19] Confirmation awaits. Baldizon has agreed to pinpoint the graves he is aware of but warns that many of the locations are in areas where a government permit is required for travel.

The Foreign Ministry, meanwhile, stepped up efforts to promote a positive picture of human rights in Nicaragua. According to Mateo Jose Guerrero, former director of the government's National Commission on Human Rights, in exile since spring 1985, reports prepared and published by the Ministry were attributed to the Human Rights Commission. Commissioners that balked were replaced and in some cases driven into exile. Those that remained were given instruction by the Foreign Ministry on the positions to take at international conferences and on how to impress visiting delegations with Nicaragua's human rights policy. The commission was then notified that all accusations against the Sandinista government would be handled by the Interior Ministry, and that the commission's chief function would be to facilitate the efforts of international groups coming to Nicaragua to investigate alleged contra violations.[20]

By 1984 the Sandinistas distinct 2-tiered strategy on human rights matched and meshed with the 2-tiered program of deception defined in 1977, and in the 72-hour document in 1979—On one level simulate and promote a positive appearance to mask, on the other level, the measures necessary to maintain and consolidate power in a revolutionary socialist state.

1984 also found the Sandinistas holding an election, an event that can most generously be described as a state-controlled plebiscite masquerading as political pluralism. Those who are concerned with the rule of law, and those who are concerned with advising Nicaragua on the rule of law, might want to ask Daniel Ortega what he is president of. The electorial law doesn't say. It just states that a president will be elected. There is no constitution. They say there won't be one until 1987. Even if you were to judge the elections as fair you would still have to ask—where is the law that says what the president is?

Meanwhile, Bayardo Arce, the member of the FSLN National Directorate in charge of overseeing the process, availed himself of the opportunity to reiterate the FSLN's strategic line during a speech to the Nicaraguan Socialist Party on the meaning of the elections. The speech was secretly taped and later appeared on the pages of newspaper Vanguardia in Barcelona. Sandinista authorities have acknowleded the speech and the Socialist Party has confirmed its authenticity.[21]

Arce delineated the Sandinistas' "two-way strategy for the confrontation with aggression during the construction of socialism." He stated that the principles of political pluralism, mixed economy and nonalignment "made us presentable in the international context." In this context, he said, elections were a necessary nuisance and would be used as an opportunity to wage a political-ideological campaign among the people. Afterward, the cover of a constitution, a "bourgeois instrument," would be used to "construct concrete socialism through the strategy of power of the Sandinista Front."

The condition of human rights in Nicaragua cannot be understood without placing it in the context of the Sandinista strategy of power.

The class war waged by the Sandinistas has now escalated into a near civil war that threatens their power. There is duel superpower intervention, first by the East Bloc and allied revolutionary states, then by the United States. A major goal of Sandinista foreign policy since 1983, and especially the human rights component of that policy, has been to deflect protest and criticism of their oppressive domestic policies, by focusing negative international attention instead, on the abuses of a rapidly growing armed opposition, and the U.S. government that has assisted it.

This policy has been largely successful. In the last year, while the Sandinistas have again utilized a forced resettlement—the removal of a projected 100,000 peasants from their homes in north central Nicaragua, begun last year and still underway—and while they have yet to respond to a request by the Inter-American Human Rights Commission for an on-site investigation of habeas corpus violations, and while last October they removed whatever political rights and civil liberties still remaining, the major human rights focus on Nicaragua has been on the alleged abuses of the contras.

Never before has an insurgency been so thoroughly investigated for human rights violations. In fact, with the exception of an America's Watch report on the behavior of the Salvadoran FMLN, no investigation focused primarily on a guerrilla group has occurred before. Contra abuses have occurred and been confirmed, most recently in a book by Washington Post reporter Christopher Dickey.[22] The brutality of some of the cases is reminiscent of methods used by Augusto Sandino himself against informers during his guerrilla exploits in the 1920s and 1930s. The "vest cut" and other curious practices have been described by his chroniclers.

But this new business of investigating rights abuses by insurgent forces raises important questions, particularly in the area of methodology. First, it must be acknowledged that a war is going on in Nicaragua, a rural war, a war in which the distinction between combatant and civilian is easily blurred. The Sandinistas themselves have been instrumental in blurring the distinction by transporting civilians in military vehicles in war zones. Why do the Sandinistas send mothers to visit their soldier sons at the front in military transport? Why are they incorporating the elderly and pre-draft age youths into armed neighborhood militias? Why do many of the militia wear civilian clothing? What happens to the distinction when the Sandinista leadership proclaims Nicaragua an armed people?

In an October interview with Washington Post correspondent Joanne Omang that was published in its entirety only in FSLN newspaper Barricada, Defense Minister Humberto Ortega said that agents from both the military and the Interior Ministry had infiltrated contra groups with the task of killing leaders and creating paranoia. He also noted that the Sandinistas has laid thousands of land mines to destroy the contras.[23] He did not mention, nor was he asked about, press reports from Honduras that claimed civilians fleeing the latest forced relocation were being killed or maimed by mines. In such an atmosphere of mutual treachery and deceit, investigators must be particularly scrupulous in analyzing the testimony of alleged victims of either side.

Then there is the phenomenon of the "rural choice" that has to be taken into account in this type of analysis. In any rural insurgency, the inhabitants of the contested area, the peasants, are faced with a choice. They can stay put and attempt to adopt a chameleon-like neutrality acceptable to both sides—they can flee to areas controlled by the government—or they can join the insurgents. When neutrality becomes too dangerous, which generally becomes the case, the inhabitants will go in what they perceive to be the safest direction.

In the last five years there has been a clear trend in both El Salvador and Guatemala. Guerrilla forces peaked in El Salvador, some reports as high as 20,000, during the period of heaviest government repression. With the advent of a democratic government and a reduction in death squad activity, the guerrilla forces have diminished to less than 6,000. In Guatemala, guerrilla forces peaked at an estimated 10,000, once again during the period of severest government repression. With the advent of democratic procedures and a reduction in death squad activities, the number is down to 2,000. Meanwhile, in Nicaragua, contra forces have grown in four years from less than 1,000 to over 20,000 and the number is rising. It is the only insurgent force in Central America today that is growing, and the manpower is coming primarily from the peasant and small landholder population. Taking into account the rights violations committed by the contras, the question than becomes—What is it about the Sandinistas that causes these people to flee and take up arms against them. And why have the Sandinistas resorted to forcibly relocating to controlled areas those that haven't fled?

From Christopher Dickey's book it also emerges that most rural dwellers in Nicaragua have a natural tendency to rebel against authority. This is generally true throughout Central America. In particular they are against Sandinista land reform which usurps private land for government-run cooperatives. Unlike dense-pack El Salvador, Nicaragua has no shortage of arable land. Why are the Sandinistas, having duly confiscated Somoza property, now forcing traditional peasant landholders into a state operation in a so-called mixed economy? The peasants are protesting that resistance means being labeled a contra by Sandinista Defense Committees. The Permanent Human Rights commission reports increasing numbers of peasant disappearances and arbitrary detentions. It would be interesting to see if the Sandinistas were so solicitous of observers seeking to investigate these allegations. Maybe the answer is in their refusal to respond to the Inter-American Commission regarding habeas corpus violations.

The use of human rights as a component of foreign policy by the Sandinistas raises, finally, the question of the role of human rights in determining U.S. foreign policy. The Sandinistas clearly perceive the issue solely as it pertains to their strategic line of political deception. There long adherence to Marxist-Leninist ideology, and their behavior in the first two years of the revolution, reveal that political pluralism was never in the cards and is unlikely to emerge if the contras were to disappear.

Despite the sophisticated facade they've manufactured, the Sandinistas are bringing final discredit to the illusion that violent revolutions of the radical left can fulfill traditional Latin American aspirations for social justice and a pluralistic political environment. They are proof that the democratization process remains the sole guarantee of human rights and freedoms in the region. And at the same time they constitute the principle deterrent to that process.

Human rights are a component of U.S. foreign policy in the sense that the United States supports, in the larger context, the democratization process that guarantees them. It is a complex, longterm policy which as yet is not completely formulated. It requires an elusive blend of diplomacy and force, two elements that are not incompatible, as well as varied forms of support and direction to nascent democratic groups, many of whom, like the contras, are struggling with great difficulty to project a plausible democratic alternative. This is not an easy task, especially in Nicaragua, a country that has not known democracy in over 50 years.

In this larger context, the Sandinistas are perfectly aware of the threat that such a policy poses for them. For this reason they are, and have been making, a concerted effort to reduce the issue of U.S. policy to human rights violations committed by their contra opposition. When the issue is so reduced, when human rights are separated from the democratization process and threaten to become the determining factor in formulating U.S. policy, then the Sandinistas are succeeding. Real goals get obscured in Capitol Hill debates over conditionality and artificial timetables. The PR factor takes over as the airwaves hum with allegations and denials based on contradictory reports from a rural war zone. Players on both sides confront the temptation to cook the books. Chaotic policy paralysis, which seems to be turning into an annual spring rite in Washington, is clearly to the advantage of the Sandinistas, which is why they have made, as Tomas Borge would say, a strategic decision to promote it.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL USA ON NICARAGUA

INTRODUCTION

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The United States section of Amnesty International, in consultation with the International Secretariat of Amnesty International in London, welcomes this opportunity to present written testimony before the U.S. Senate on the current human rights situation in Nicaragua.

Amnesty International is an independent worldwide human rights movement which, since its inception, has worked impartially for the release of all prisoners of conscience, fair and prompt trials for all political prisoners, and an end to torture and execution. Amnesty International is independent of all governments, political factions, ideologies, economic interests and religious creeds. It has consultative status with ECOSOC of the United Nations, UNESCO and the Council of Europe, has cooperative relations with the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights of the Organization of American States, and has observer status with the Organization of African Unity. Amnesty International was the recipient of the 1977 Nobel Prize for Peace.

Considerable controversy exists as to the state of human rights in Nicaragua today. In reviewing the record, we find that fact and fiction have become difficult to distinguish. It is in this area that Amnesty International USA hopes to make a contribution to these hearings.

For a quarter of a century, Amnesty International has monitored human rights worldwide. During this time we have maintained a reputation for impartiality and accuracy in our reporting. Nicaragua has been the subject of numerous publications and onsite investigations during this period.

Amnesty International has closely monitored the human rights situation in Nicaragua both during the Government of General Anastasio Somoza Debayle as well as since its fall in July 1979.

Under the Government of General Anastasio Somoza Debayle, Amnesty International's concerns in Nicaragua included arbitrary arrests, summary executions, "disappearances," and the widespread and systematic use of torture, directed at those believed to represent actual or potential opposition to the government. In the final years of civil conflict, thousands of Nicaraguans were summarily executed by Somoza's security forces.

The present submission addresses specific aspects of the human rights situation in Nicaragua since the new government came to power in July, 1979, insofar as they relate to areas of concern within the statute of Amnesty International.

THE RECORD OF THE GOVERNMENT

Background to Amnesty International's current concerns

Amnesty International's concerns in the first years after the fall of the Somoza Government centered on the detention and trial of collaborators with the former government, in particular, members of the National Guard and Somoza's intelligence services. An estimated 7,000 suspected collaborators were detained in the immediate aftermath of the government's fall. Following preliminary investigation, many of those initially detained were released. By the first months of 1980 an estimated 5,300 remained in custody to face criminal charges and trial. Most of them were former National Guards held in connection with human rights abuses committed under the authority of the previous government. Charges were brought within the terms of the penal code in force under the Somoza Government.

It is well documented that an estimated one hundred former security personnel were reported to have been the victims of vengeance killings in July 1979 after being captured by residents in provincial Nicaraguan towns.

Of particular concern to Amnesty International during this period were procedures utilized by a special court system created explicitly to try alleged supporters of, and collaborators with, the Somoza government. These Special Courts of Justice were set up to try prisoners accused of crimes committed under the authority of the Somoza Government. Prisoners falling into this category were charged under the penal code in force at the time of the alleged offenses. The special courts functioned outside the normal court system, with no provision for appeals against sentences beyond the special courts' own appeals court.

By February 1981, when the special courts were dissolved, they had handed down convictions in the cases of 4,331 of the over 6,000 prisoners initially charged with having committed crimes under the authority of the previous government. An Amnesty International report published in June 1982 outlined the organization's assessment of the trials by the special tribunals, as well as other concerns. It was Amnesty International's conclusion at that time that serious procedural irregularities impeding the right to fair trial had occurred. Recommendations were made by Amnesty International for a systematic review of cases heard by the special court system.

The Government of Nicaragua responded to this recommendation for a systematic review of the special court cases with the enactment in November 1981 of a Law of Pardon. This law established a procedure for an administrative review of sentences handed down by the special courts (or under the 1979 Public Order Law) as well as for pardons, commutation or reduction of sentences. This review was to be carried out separately from the judicial process and involved only undertaking investigations and recommending pardons. Rulings on pardons were to be made by the national political authorities. Although the Law of Pardon has resulted in the release of hundreds of prisoners, it has not been systematically applied as a remedy for injustices in the proceedings of the special tribunal during 1980 and 1981. Amnesty International has continued to recommend a systematic review of sentences handed down by the special tribunals in order to remedy possible miscarriages of justice in the trials which took place during that period.

Human rights abuses of concern to Amnesty International since that time have most frequently been reported in the context of armed conflict in remote areas and involve procedures for detecting and punishing collaborators with armed opposition groups. Most political prisoners detained since 1981 have been charged with collaboration with such groups. In cases in which prisoners of conscience have been wrongly accused of the use or advocacy of violence, they have generally been released before being brought to trial.

Amnesty International's current concerns

Amnesty International's current concerns in Nicaragua include a pattern of frequent, short-term imprisonment of prisoners of conscience, prolonged pretrial incommunicado detention of political prisoners, restrictions on the right to a fair trial, and poor prisons conditions for political prisoners. Amnesty International has received some reports of torture, arbitrary killings and unacknowledged detentions carried out by military personnel in remote areas undergoing armed conflict.[1] In the course of 1984 and 1985 Amnesty International took action on behalf of 12 prisoners it believed were prisoners of conscience or probable prisoners of conscience.

The Public Order Law and Political Imprisonment

Most prisoners of conscience and other political prisoners detained in recent years have been held under a Public Order Law first enacted in 1979 which defines and punishes a broad range of political offenses, and establishes summary trial procedures by which it is to be applied. The Ley para el Mantenimiento del Orden y Seguridad Publica, Law for the Maintenance of Public Order and Security, Decree No. 5 of July 1979, defined offenses related to national security, ranging from possession of military weapons or explosives and crimes of political violence to offenses related to the exercise of freedom of expression. In its current form, as Decree 1074 of June 6, 1982, the law remains the principal legislation applied in the prosecution of political offenses.

Special summary trial procedures established for the Public Order Law's application have been of particular concern to Amnesty International from the new law's inception. The special trial procedure prescribed in the original form of the law severely limited the right to defense: lawyers were allowed only two days to prepare their clients' written defense after formal notification of the charge had been made to the court, trials were to be concluded within three days, and sentences were to be handed down within 48 hours of the completion of the trial period. In practice, limitations on the periods within which the proceedings were to be completed were more flexible than provided for in the law—in part because the courts found it impossible to deal with complex cases, sometimes involving large groups of defendants, in the time periods stipulated. The preparation of cases by the defense in the largely written proceedings was nonetheless severely hampered by the special procedure, and the calling of witnesses for the defense from distant parts of the country was in many cases impossible within the time period stipulated. Summary trial procedures, with some modifications, are also prescribed by the current form of the law.

A further concern was that the original law stated that judges hearing Public Order Law cases were to disregard normal rules for assessing evidence and act solely in accord with their consciences. Although this was subsequently modified by Decree 896 in 1981 to require judges to apply the norms of "sound criticism" in assessing evidence, no changes were made to the law's strict limitation on the period for defendants to prepare a defense and produce evidence under the special rapid procedure. Decree 1074 of June 6, 1982, which revised and reissued the Public Order Law in the terms under which it remains in force, again left the extraordinary trial procedures largely unchanged. The creation in 1983 of a system of special courts to apply these procedures in trying Public Order Law cases is discussed further below.

Amnesty International was also concerned about the law's definitions of crimes, in particular those relating to conspiracy and to freedom of expression. These definitions were imprecise and open to arbitrary interpretation, so providing a basis for the prosecution of individuals who, while opposing the government and its policies, had neither used nor advocated violence. Of particular concern was Article 4, which in its original form made punishable certain spoken or written "expressions, proclamations, or manifestos" intended to "damage the popular interests and abolish the conquests achieved by the people." Although this clause was replaced under Decree 488 of August 9, 1980, its new form (which as Article 4(b) remains unchanged under Decree 1074), continued to provide for imprisonment of from 10 days to two years for those responsible for certain categories of public statement, including those intended to undermine national security; the economy; public order; health; morals, the judicial power; "the dignity of persons, the reputation and rights of others"; and "the legitimately constituted authorities."

From its inception the Public Order Law was defined as an extraordinary measure to meet a temporary national crisis. In its original form the law was to remain in force only as long as the state of national emergency remained in force. When the state of national emergency was lifted on April 29, 1980, however, the decree lifting the state of emergency modified the terms of the Public Order Law and incorporated it into the body of permanent penal legislation. Although modified on several occasions, a presently in force as Decree 1074 of June 6, 1982, the Public Order Law with its summary procedures has continued to be applied in virtually all political cases. Since 1983 the Public Order Law has been applied by a system of special courts.

Emergency Legislation and the Restriction of Civil Rights

Many long-standing Amnesty International concerns have related to emergency legislation introduced in the aftermath of the civil war. The government has sought to justify these measures as necessary for reconstruction, to meet extraordinary economic crises, and, after 1981, to cope with problems caused by domestic and international armed conflict. Provisions in this legislation facilitating the detention and prosecution of prisoners of conscience have been of particular concern.

Since 1979, states of emergency have been in effect almost continuously. A Law of National Emergency was decreed on July 22, 1979 which resulted in the suspension of certain civil rights. Its preamble declared its intent to facilitate reconstruction in the aftermath of the enormous loss of life and the destruction of much of Nicaragua's economic infrastructure under the previous government. The Statute of the Rights and Guarantees of Nicaraguans, decreed shortly afterwards, enumerated the specific rights that could be suspended under a state of emergency, while outlining the civil rights that may not be suspended under any circumstances. Under Article 49 these include the rights to life (Article 5), "physical, psychological and moral integrity" (Article 6), and other basic human rights which in accord with international human rights law may not be suspended under any circumstances. The statute specified in its concluding section that the suspension of civil rights then in force under the Law of National Emergency applied solely to those people then under investigation for crimes committed during the Somoza Government. These rights were suspended for a period of 60 days except those specified under Article 49. This suspension of civil rights was periodically renewed by subsequent legislation. It remained in effect until the lifting of the state of emergency in April 1980.

Following the lifting of the state of emergency in April 1980 and the dissolution of the special tribunals, the formal suspension of civil rights was lifted for more than a year. In practice, however, the full range of civil liberties was not always respected. The Public Order Law remained the principal basis for detentions of suspected political offenders. While some were individuals charged with violent political crimes, others were believed to be prisoners of conscience, detained solely on the basis of their non-violent political activity.

In September 1981, a State of Economic and Social Emergency was decreed. Under its provisions some civil rights, including the right to strike, were suspended. The exercise of freedom of expression was also limited by making punishable the dissemination of information considered damaging to the economy. Some prisoners of conscience were detained as a direct consequence of the new measure.

Armed conflict in Nicaragua was first cited by the government to justify the suspension of civil rights when a state of emergency was imposed in Northern Zelaya department in December 1981, after a series of cross-border attacks by irregular military forces in the Coco River area. In March 1982, a nationwide state of emergency was declared. The government maintained that this was a necessary response to "International aggression."

[1] In recent years Amnesty International has been encouraged by a pattern of investigation and prosecution of government personnel accused of such abuses. Among cases in which military personnel have been punished for abuses of prisoners are the sentencing of an army officer to 44 years' imprisonment in March 1984 on two counts of murder and for the torture of four captives during operations against armed opposition forces near the Honduran border in late 1983. In another case, a lieutenant was sentenced to 18 years for rape said to have been committed during maneuvers near an Indian settlement in northern Nicaragua. Despite the pattern of investigation and prosecution of government personnel alleged to be guilty of such violations, some serious abuses have been reported in remote areas which may not have been investigated.

Under the March 1982 decree of a state of emergency Nicaragua suspended those civil rights which may be suspended under Article 49 of the Statute of the Rights and Guarantees of Nicaraguans, with some modification of its terms. As a party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Nicaragua has, as required under Article 4 of the Covenant, regularly notified the Secretary-General of the United Nations of its specific reasons for the measure, the period it is to remain in force, and the articles of the Covenant from which it has derogated. Rights suspended of direct concern to Amnesty International include rights to individual liberty and due process of law, the right to freedom of assembly, movement, and expression, and the right to strike.

Initially imposed for a 30-day period, the state of emergency, with some changes in its terms, has remained in force to the present. Some basic rights were restored in mid-1984 in preparation for elections for the legislature and the presidency in November of that year. These measures restored the rights to hold political assemblies and demonstrations, the right to freedom of movement throughout most of the country, and the right to strike. They also formally lifted censorship for the preelectoral period—except for material concerning national security. The restriction of the right to habeas corpus and not to be arbitrarily detained remained in force, however, in cases involving national security (as defined in Article 1 and 2 of the Public Order Law), bringing little effective change with regard to the rights of political suspects.

The terms of the state of emergency were modified twice during 1985. The most recent state of emergency, declared in October 1985, was particularly severe in its restriction of civil rights. The scope of the state of emergency was extended to include the suspension of freedom of expression, freedom of movement, freedom of association, habeas corpus, and the rights to strike and hold public meetings and demonstrations. These measures were relaxed by the legislature in November 1985. The restriction on freedom of expression was limited to censorship of matters concerning military and economic affairs considered prejudicial to national security. The restriction of freedom of movement remains limited in war zones and public meetings, demonstrations, and strike action are permitted only with prior authorization. Habeas corpus was restored in non-political cases as under the terms of the state of emergency in force prior to October 1985.

Habeas Corpus

The primary remedy against arbitrary detention and prolonged incommunicado detention under Nicaraguan law is habeas corpus. The remedy of habeas corpus is regulated by Decree 232 of January 1980 and Decree 417 of May 1980 wich elaborates on its terms. Of particular concern to Amnesty International have been restrictions on the right to habeas corpus which have generally occurred under the provisions of the state of emergency. Petitions for habeas corpus are submitted to the Appellate Courts, but in cases of the existence of a state of emergency, may be raised directly with the Supreme Court for consideration.

The judiciary's interpretation of the suspension of habeas corpus has referred to international norms which permit restrictions of civil rights only in so far as "strictly necessary" under particular emergency circumstances. The Nicaraguan Supreme Court ruled that the remedy of habeas corpus would remain in force in penal cases not related to the causes to which the state of emergency was attributed, notably the security of the state. The Supreme Court has also consistently ruled that even in state security cases habeas corpus remained applicable whenever necessary to protect basic human rights not suspended by the state of emergency. In this regard, the Supreme Court has responded to serious allegations of ill-health, ill-treatment, or "disappearance" by appointing magistrates to execute habeas corpus by visiting prisoners held incommunicado in State Security Service custody.

Despite a legal doctrine making habeas corpus applicable as a remedy for serious abuse under the state of emergency, Supreme court directives to the State Security Service to permit magistrates access to prisoners implementing habeas corpus have sometimes been flouted. A further limitation of habeas corpus has been the reluctance of some Appelate Courts to accept claims of illness or threats to physical safety as a justification for the court to demand access to prisoners held incommunicado in cases considered to have a political element. In practice, the Appelate Courts have considered prisoners in the custody of the State Security Service, or undergoing investigation by that agency, to be by definition political cases.

Detention and Interrogation Procedures: The State Security Service

Since the creation of a new government in 1979, the Ministry of Interior's State Security Service has taken primary responsibility for the detention and interrogation of most suspects in political cases. Incommunicado detention is the norm for prisoners in State Security Service custody, with prisoners frequently held incommunicado for from 15 to 30 days and sometimes for up to several months. Although the State Security Service maintains offices and detention facilities in most major towns, the principal detention and interrogation facility is at its headquarters in Managua, known as "El Chipote." Most political detainees are reportedly brought for interrogation to "El Chipote" and held there pending indictment or release.

Prison conditions within the State Security Service have been of concern to Amnesty International. Released prisoners have reported a disorienting regime in which lights are left on continually, or turned on only at meal-times or when prisoners are to bathe: in which water or food is withheld, or extra meals provided, in an apparent attempt to make prisoners believe more time has passed. Deprivation of sleep has also been reported, with prisoners required to shout "present" as guards tap on the iron doors of their cells at 10-minute intervals. Punishments reported have included forced calisthenics as well as forced standing during prolonged interrogation periods. Threats that prisoners could remain in "El Chipote" indefinately, or that relatives could be detained, have also been reported.

Withdraw of certain amenities has been reported to be a principal form of punishment. Some prisoners have reported being refused permission to bathe for long periods; being refused paper for sanitary use; being denied clean overalls or permission to wash them or the removal of mattresses or blankets. Privileges reported have included permission to wear underwear under prison overalls, provision of tooth brushes, soap and towels, and shaving materials.

In practice, under the state of emergency the State Security Service's actions appear to be largely unrestricted by the judiciary or any other civil authority. Amnesty International was concerned that in some cases the State Security Service appeared to have fabricated evidence and to have manipulated the government news media in order to denigrate political opponents, and justify their detention and prosecution. Further concern has been expressed at the general failure of the Ministry of Justice (the public prosecutor's office) or the courts to challenge the validity of such "confessions" recorded by the State Security Service while prisoners were held incommunicado.

In a June 1985 letter to President Ortega, Amnesty International stressed its concern at the extraordinary de facto powers accorded the State Security Service under the state of emergency, and the consequent scope for abuse of these powers. The organization noted that the State Security Service routinely carried out detentions without apparent basis in law; that long periods of incommunicado detention subject to no known regulation were the norm for State Security Service prisoners in pretrial detention; that in some cases even members of the judiciary were denied access to prisoners by the State Security Service and that State Security Service prisoners were routinely denied consultation with defense lawyers, or contact with families or doctors. Concern was also expressed about the lack of accountability of the State Security Service to the judiciary. State Security Service officers carrying out arrests and interrogations, who are responsible for determining the conditions and duration of incommunicado, administrative detention, are apparently accountable in practice only to the Minister of the Interior, and not to any court of law or other supervisory authority.

Amnesty International proposed several institutional measures to prevent the imprisonment of prisoners of conscience and ill-treatment of prisoners. It called on the authorities to end certain broad powers exercised by the State Security Service. These included its powers to carry out detentions arbitrarily, without court order, on mere suspicion or in order to intimidate; to hold prisoners indefinitely in isolation and incommunicado; to record statements without the presence of lawyers or representatives of any other government or judicial authority: and to present written or video-taped statements prepared under these circumstances as unchallenged "confessions" admissable as evidence before the courts. Amnesty International further recommended that prisoners be brought before the courts without delay after detention, and that the courts be given unrestricted access to prisoners in application of the remedy of habeas corpus, whether prisoners are held in custody of the State Security Service or other police or military authorities.

The organization also stated its concern that every allegation of ill-treatment of prisoners be impartially and effectively investigated. It further stressed that complainants in such cases should be protected from intimidation, (whether in the form of threats of violence by interrogators, of further incommunicado detention, or reprisals through harsher sentences handed down by the courts against those alleging ill-treatment).

The State Security Service has since 1981 maintained a public information office in Managua, known as "Casa 50." The office was created in the context of allegations in 1979 and 1980 that prisoners detained by the State Security Service and held incommunicado had "disappeared." According to Interior Ministry representatives, "Casa 50" was to receive reports of all arrests by the State Security Service in the Managua area twice daily, and to make available such information on request. In practice it appears to have served to confirm the whereabouts of most State Security Service prisoners detained in the Managua area. While not eliminating the uncertainty of prisoners' families about their relatives' legal status, by promptly acknowledging State Security Service arrests, the office has largely eliminated allegations of "disappearance" of prisoners. Although a second Ministry of the Interior information office was subsequently opened in September 1982 to receive complaints and provide information on prisoners throughout the country, the rapid communication of information and arrests in remote areas to families of detainees has not yet been achieved.

The Prison System

After Nicaraguan prisoners are formally charged before the courts they are generally transferred from police custody—or in political cases, from the custody of the State Security Service—to prisons of the National Penetentiary System. Like the police services, the National Penetentiary System falls under the authority of the Ministry of the Interior. Most political prisoners and sentenced members of the former government's security services are held in one of two prisons in the Managua area. The larger, the Centro de Readaptaction "Jorge Navarro" at Tipitapa, is a top security prison which houses prisoners who have already been sentenced. The majority of its estimated 2,400 prisoners are former members of the Nicaraguan National Guard convicted of crimes committed under the Somoza Government. Some 300 prisoners in "Jorge Navarro" prison, however, are serving sentences of 10 or more years following conviction on charges under the Public Order Law relating to events subsequent to July 1979. Amnesty International has raised fair trial concerns in the cases of both prisoners tried under Special Tribunals in 1980 and 1981, and those convicted of Public Order Law offenses, and has urged that their cases be reviewed.

Prisoners detained but not yet tried on charges under the Public Order Law, or those serving sentences of less than 10 years under that law, are generally held at Managua's Centro de Readaptaction "Heroes y Martires de Nueva Guinea" generally known as "Zona Franca" jail. An estimated 800 to 1,000 prisoners charged or convicted of Public Order Law offenses are reported to be in detention there.

Prison conditions at both of the major detention centres are said to be harsh, with severe overcrowding the norm. Sanitary facilities are minimal, with cells provided with tin cans for toilet facilities, and drinking water stored in cells in plastic bags. Regulations base privileges, defined to include such things as recreation in prison patios and sports fields and the frequency with which prisoners may receive visitors, largely on whether prisoners participate in prison workshops and vocational programs. Work programs, however, are limited in the numbers of prisoners they can accommodate, and participation is itself to some extent a privilege. Participants in these programs are held under less severe conditions, with access to patios and weekly family visits. Most top-security prisoners serving long sentences, however, are apparently denied the opportunity to participate in work programs. As a consequence they are held under a strict regime, with infrequent access to exercise, fresh air and sunshine; one family member is permitted to visit only every 45 days.

In addition to those held in the regular centers of the penitentiary system, some prisoners who have been classified as particularly dangerous have been held on an apparently permanent basis in the top security "El Chipote" detention centre. Others appear to have been relegated to "El Chipote" as a consequence of protest actions in Tipitapa's "Jorge Navarro" prison. A hunger strike begun in October 1983 by some 120 prisoners held in Gallery Three of that prison, demanding better food and conditions, eventually ended with the transfer of the protesting detainees to "El Chipote." They were held there in incommunicade detention until the hunger strike ended. Most were reportedly held, without bunks or beddings, in a large cell without natural light, and with only buckets for sanitation. It was subsequently learned that during the prolonged period of isolation some prisoners became seriously ill. Further hunger strikers were reportedly denied appropriate medical attention until the end of the hunger strike. Most the hunger strikers were reportedly returned to the "Jorge Navarro" prison in January 1984.

A second hunger strike protesting conditions in Tipitapa was reported in February 1985 to have involved some 20 top security prisoners serving 30-year sentences there. Two days after the hunger strike was initiated the prisoners were reportedly transferred to "El Chipote" and held there until the protest was suspended. Amnesty Internatinal expressed its concern about the health of the protesters and about their reported incommunicado detention in "El Chipote." No response was received from the authorities regarding these reports.

The Atlantic Coast

The Atlantic Coast region, which includes Zelaya department (subdivided administratively into Zelaya Norte and Zela Sur) and part of Rio San Juan department, comprises some 56 per cent of Nicaragua's territory, with a population of about 250,000 of Nicaragua's more than three million people.

The Miskitos are the major ethnic group in the north half of the Atlantic Coast region. Unofficial estimates place the Miskito population at about 120,000. Other indigenous people are the Rama, estimated to number about 700, some 7,000 Sumo, and an estimated 1,300 Garifuna. The region also has a black, English-speaking coastal population of about 30,000, and primarily in the southern and western parts of the region, a Spanish-speaking mestizo population (of Spanish and Indian origin) estimated at over 100,000.

In February 1981 Nicaraguan state security forces carried out a series of arrests under the Public Order Law in the isolated Atlantic Coast region. Some 200 prisoners, mostly of Miskito origin, were detained in December 1981 in the dispersed communities of the area and taken to the regional capital, Puerto Cabezas. Most were held incommunicade for nearly a month in the custody of State Security Service there. Some prisoners subsequently reported having been ill-treated after their arrest, held for long periods stripped naked, and subjected to kicks, beatings and death threats. Amnesty International expressed concern both about reports of ill-treatment, and also about the conduct of a summary trial in February 1982 in which 135 of the prisoners were convicted of Public Order Law offenses. Eight Miskito Indians were convicted of involvement in violent incidents at San Carlos. Miskito Indian sources subsequently maintained, however, that the forces directly involved in the armed violence of December 1981 had crossed into Honduras before government forces counter-attacked, and that many of the defendants had been detained virtually at random after government forces regained control of the settlements in which the incidents took place.

Although the allegations of ill treatment were to Amnesty International's knowledge never the subject of investigation by the courts or executive authorities, the judge presiding over the first instance trial was dismissed by the Supreme Court as a consequence of his conduct of the trial, and an appeal court in June 1982 drastically reduced or reversed most of th:e sentences. Many of those sentenced, however, including some Amnesty International believed were probably prisoners of conscience, remained in custody until their release in a general amnesty of Miskito prisoners in December 1983.

A decree of December 1, 1983 resulted in the immediate release of 307 Nicaraguans of Miskito and Sumo Indian origin, and some non-Indian prisoners. They had been detained in the coast area at different times since December 1981. Charges were also dropped against individuals not in dentention. An estimated 45 others were released under the decree in the first months of 1984.

A further amnesty law was passed in April 1985, covering Miskito, Sumo and Rama Indians detained for political offenses. Amnesty International did not know the number of prisoners affected.

Allegations of cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment of detainees, including rape, were made in March 1984 following army operations in the Miskito hamlet Lapan, near Puerto Cabezas in Northern Zelaya. Investigation was followed by an army court martial which sentenced the junior lieutenant commanding the detachment to 18 years' imprisonment for rape.

COMPULSORY RELOCATIONS OF COMMUNITIES IN COMBAT ZONES

In the aftermath of the armed clashes of December 1981 in the Coco River area, residents of most of the Miskito Indian settlements along the lower reaches of the river were forcibly evacuated by Nicaraguan troops to sites some 60 kilometers into the interior of the country where new settlements were to be established. Many abandoned settlements were then burned to eliminate sources of shelter or supplies for opposition forces, and to deter unauthorized return by the civilian population. The government maintained that the civilian population was relocated for its own protection, and declared the border area a military zone through which movement was closely controlled.

Amnesty International's concern was to determine whether individuals had been subjected to torture or ill treatment, or arbitrarily killed, during the forcible relocation, and whether the conditions under which these individuals were resettled were analogous to imprisonment for reasons of belief, race, ethnic origin, sex or language. The organization subsequently found that the relocation was carried out in an abrupt and peremtory manner and involved hardship and suffering for the estimated 8,500 people involved, but did not believe the conditions in which individuals were resettled in the interior to be comparable with imprisonment. No cases of shootings or other deliberate brutality during the transfers were found.

Coco River residents were resettled in January and February 1982 in four new settlements established near the road linking Puerto Cabezas with Rosita in the interior, with tents gradually replaced by prefabricated wooden housing. Population movements in the Atlantic Coast area were closely monitored after January 1981 through a system of photo-identity cards. However, residents of the new settlements were not restricted in their movements in the surrounding countryside, although outboard motors and firearms used in hunting and fishing were confiscated, and could travel to regional market towns, or emigrate to western areas of the country if they wished. Return to the Coco River area, however, was strictly forbidden.

Further compulsory evacuations of rural populations were carried out in Jinotega Department along the Bokay River and the upper reaches of the Coco River in November 1982. They involved an estimated 5,000 Miskito and mestizo residents, some of whom were resettled in a coffee-growing area near Wiwili and San Jose de Bocay.

In late 1983 a further Atlantic Coast resettlement area was established at Sangnilaya, northwest of Puerto Cabezas, to which 1,000 residents composing the population of nine hamlets in the same areas were forced to relocate on the stated grounds that they could not otherwise be protected or receive social services. By December 1984 most of the 1,000 residents had returned to their original communities, although some continued to return periodically to work agricultural land developed in 1984 at the now largely abandoned settlement.

In a shift in government policy in 1985, the compulsory relocation policy on the Atlantic Coast was modified, and many residents of the original resettlement areas returned to the Coco River area. Compulsory relocation or rural population, however, remains an element of government policy in response to the continuing armed conflict. A major relocation program was announced in March 1985, which is reported to involve some 7,000 mestizo families from mountainous areas of Matagalpa and Jinotega departments in which opposition forces had been active.

The Atlantic Coast: unresolved cases

Although recent allegations of abuse of authority in the Atlantic Coast region appear generally to have been investigated by central authorities and their findings made public, some past cases have not been publicly resolved. Investigations into alleged abuses by military forces, moreover, may have been limited to confidential proceedings under the jurisdiction of the army itself before 1984.

Among the most significant allegations are charges of extrajudicial executions at the Coco River settlement Leimus in December 1981 and allegations of the forcible "disappearance" of Miskito Indian prisoners in 1982.

The Leimus Case: December 1981

Allegations of extra-judicial executions by Nicaraguan troops were first made in January 1982 in the Honduran press. According to these reports, sources on the Honduran side of the border reported having heard gunfire on December 23, 1981, and having seen people fleeing from Leimus in Nicaragua across the Coco River to seek refuge in Honduras.

The Leimus incident occurred in the context of cross-border raids in December 1981, the first significant military activity by opposition forces in the Atlantic Coast region. On December 14, 12 members of the Nicaraguan militia had been seized and subsequently murdered by opposition forces at San Carlos, the largest town on the upper reaches of the Coco River; and for a two-day period, December 20 and 21, opposition forces occupied San Carlos. When government forces restored control they found that seven soldiers captured had been tortured and killed, their bodies mutilated. Other attacks were reported periodically up and down the river until government troops were reinforced at the end of December.

The initial public response of the Government of Nicaragua to allegations of a "massacre" at Leimus and other allegations in early 1982 of massive abuses in the Atlantic Coast area was to deny that they had occurred. In February 1982, it invited the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights to visit the Atlantic Coast for an on-site investigation of the situation. The Commission did so in May of that year, and again in June 1983.

Despite its apparent cooperation with the Inter-American Commission, no specific response to inquiries into the events at Leimus was made by the government to the Commission or to other international bodies until September 1982, when a statement was issued by the Army's Office of Public Relations. The document stated that 14 men had been detained at Leimus as suspected collaborators with the armed opposition forces in December 1981. It further stated that the 14 men had subsequently made an escape attempt four days later when the Leimus detachment was attacked by a force crossing the Coco River. The statement maintained that the 14 had been fired upon by guards, but that it had not subsequently been confirmed whether any had been killed outright, although three bodies recovered downstream from Leimus were thought to have been those of some of the prisoners. The names of the 14, it said, could not be confirmed as when Liemus was evacuated after the incident the records had been lost.

In contrast to the army's account, a non-governmental testimony indicated that some 35 people had been detained in Leimus although some claimed more than 80. While former Leimus residents confirmed having heard a single series of gunshots that same night, however, they maintain that no attack had taken place. Government reports released in January 1982 listing incidents along the Coco River during that week also omitted reference to incidents at Leimus on that date.

Other accounts of the killings at Leimus refer to the victims having been in a boat or boats on the river when killed.

Another testimony published by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, by a survivor of the incident, tended to confirm that the number of prisoners held in Leimus was considerably more than 14.

A document was prepared in 1983 by the government-created National Commission for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights (CNPPDH) on the basis of its own investigation into the Leimus incident in visits there in November and December 1982 and May 1983. The document added little to an understanding of the events, however, apart from making it clear that several individuals had been wrongly identified as among those who died there. The report made no reference to an escape attempt. It cited the testimony of a Leimus resident that about 40 Miskitos has been taken into custody that night and that gunfire had been heard on one occasion. Although no explanation was offered for the fate of the prisoners not accounted for, the CNPPDH concluded that "the denunciations of alleged massacres . . . are false."

A secret Ministry of the Interior Special Investigations Unit report on Leimus contradicts the army's initial statement on the incident and the conclusions made public by the CNPPDH. The report includes a deposition taken in 1984 from a junior officer present with army and militia forces at Leimus in December 1981. This statement, and the army report's conclusion, tend to support the allegations that at least 13 prisoners were killed at Leimus on 23 December 1981, in apparent extrajudicial executions (although some may have died in the course of an escape attempt). The statement refers to 25 prisoners having been held, and to the killing of 13 prisoners after an escape attempt on the night of December 23. The junior officer also states that he was told by another person that nine prisoners had previously been killed at Leimus in revenge for the killings of security personnel during the 20-21 December occupation of San Carlos.

The summary of the Leimus case included in the dossier concludes that nine prisoners were summarily executed before the night of 23 December, and that on that night "after a supposed escape by two detainees," the border chief ordered the summary execution first of seven, then of the last six prisoners held. The names of the victims are not confirmed, although the report reproduces the names of victims given in denunciations by human rights organizations and the group MISURA. The report adds that the individuals implicated in the events, including both military personnel and Ministry of the Interior personnel, were tried by the military courts but that they were released six months after their detention. The number of such detainees, and the dates of their detentions, are not specified.

Although little information on the internal military proceedings regarding the events at Leimus has been made public, a copy of a military court ruling was provided to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, date 2 April 1983, which exonerated two named junior officers of the crime of murder. Despite the evidence published by domestic and international organizations on the Leimus incident, and the Ministry of the Interior's own investigation report, the Nicaraguan authorities have not released the records or findings of military inquiries into the Leimus incident. Neither have they publicly established the fate of the reported captives still unaccounted for, nor formally acknowledged that crimes were committed by military personnel at Leimus. Although no cases similar to that of Leimus have come to the attention of Amnesty International, it remains concerned that the incident and the fate of those once captive there have not been fully clarified.

Allegations of "Disappearance": July to October 1982

Another unresolved case in the Atlantic Coast area involves reports of "disappearances" in 1982. A list compiled by Moravian Church authorities, made public late in 1983, named 72 Miskitos reportedly arrested between July and October 1982 in communities around Puerto Cabezas who have not been accounted for. Twenty-eight were identified only by name, with no date or place of arrest given; more detailed information was provided on 44 of the cases, which included seven men reported detained by troops on July 19, in the hamlets Cru-Warvan and Yulo, and 14 detained on July 25 at Kligna-landing on the Karata lagoon.

On several occasions detentions were said to have followed orders by leaders of army patrols for all residents to assemble to attend meetings. As a consequence the reported detentions of groups of people were carried out in the presence of numerous witnesses. Such group arrests were reported at Mani-Watla on July 20, when four detainees were reportedly held briefly in a school house before being taken from the area (Agapito Almanza Henry, Pedro Gonzalez, Lorenzo Pasquier, and Valentin Pasquier), and again on September 2, when five men were reportedly detained after a meeting (Pedro Armstrong, Jonatan Cristobal, Eleuterio Downs Berry, Gregorio Joel Alfred, and Emiliano Usyan Armstrong).

The government responded in June 1983 to inquiries by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights on 28 of the cases, naming three men it says were killed in armed confrontations between 15 and 20 April 1982 and 11 it said simply were "not in jail." The dates of releases were provided for eight prisoners, and six were identified as being held in Managua's "Zona Franca" prison, registered under slightly different names. Amnesty International subsequently requested an official copy of the government's response to the Inter-American Commission regarding the fate of the 28 individuals, as well as documentation such as copies of detention orders, release orders, prisoner records or death certificates, but no official information on the case was provided.

An Amnesty International delegation which visited Nicaragua in July 1984 received information indicating that some of the individuals still formally unaccounted for had died after capture by army or State Security Service forces. This included reports of individual meetings with regional authorities in which relatives were reportedly informed that the missing had died in unspecified circumstances. Nicaraguan officials met by the delegation provided no information on the cases.

The 1984 Ministry of the Interior report cited above provides the most detailed information available from official sources on the 1982 cases, reproducing the information given to investigators from army and State Security Service records. A summary report included in the dossier, dated April 30, 1984, identifies the detaining force and provides dates of detention and release for 24 of the reported "disapproved," and lists 27 others on which it states that no records could be found.

The report indicates that the 21 others, according to confidential records, were killed either at or near the scene of their reported detentions, or in armed conflict. Information provided concerning the 14 individuals reported to have "disappeared" from Kligna-landing on July 25, 1982, includes copies of written complaints by relatives, stating that when they met the Special Zone One Commander on December 29, 1983, they were informed that their relatives were dead, without any further details. A report from Special Zone One, dated February 9, 1984, answers investigators' queries on the matter. It maintains that no prisoners were taken at Kligna-landing on July 25, 1982, but that an armed group fleeing from a government assault on a training camp at Seven Benk had been attacked there, killing nine. According to the report, only one carried personal documents, and was identified as Larry Wellington, one of those reported to have "disappeared." The investigators' summary report offers no evaluation of the credibility of the account. Despite this, Amnesty International has been informed by opposition sources that dependent relatives of the Kligna-landing residents—and some others still unsatisfactorily accounted for—have been granted government pensions, although no formal statement acknowledging government responsibility for the fate of their relatives has been issued.

In addition to the reported deaths at Kligna-landing, the 1984 report identifies seven individuals who are said to have been the object of "Special Measures," a term apparently used to signify summary execution. According to the 1984 report, these killings were confirmed by the headquarters of Special Zone One in Puerto Cabezas, and figure on a list prepared by that authority of persons "with whom special measures were taken" in the region. The report notes that the existence of the list is known to superior authorities.

The report does not indicate the time period within which such cases were reported in Special Zone One, whether individuals other than those reported to have "disappeared" in 1982 were reported as victims, or whether those responsible for such actions had been the subject of investigation and disciplinary action. Amnesty International is concerned that the use of the term "Special Measures" to describe the apparent summary executions of 1982 suggests that in certain circumstances such actions were tolerated by higher authorities and that their occurrence was deliberately concealed. Amnesty international will continue to seek public clarification of the cases of reported "disappearances" of July to October 1982.

THE RECORD OF OPPOSITION FORCES

In addition to human rights violations attributed to the Government of Nicaragua, a pattern of abuses by armed opposition forces has been regularly reported, including the routine torture. mutilation, and summary execution of captives. Irregular military forces opposing the Nicaraguan Government are believed to be responsible for these abuses.

Irregular military forces were first reported to be carrying out actions against the Nicaraguan Government and civilian targets near the Honduran border in 1980. Their first reported victims were participants in a nationwide literacy campaign who were sent to remote villages and were captured and murdered. Several groups claimed credit for attacks during 1980, including the 15th of September Legion, a force of some 400 former members of the National Guard, headed by National Guard Colonel Enrique Bermudez. In 1981, however, military operations against Nicaraguan targets began on a much larger scale, following an amalgamation of groups of former National Guardsmen in Honduras under the name Fuerza Democratica Nicaraguense, (FDN), Nicaraguan Democratic Force, the estimated 10,000-strong force operating since 1982 from permanent bases in Honduras.[2]

A second armed opposition group, MISURA, is a largely Miskito Indian force, which operates with its primary military base in the Honduran hamlet Rus Rus.

A third armed opposition army, the Alianza Revolucionaria Democratica (ARDE), Democratic Revolutionary Alliance, was created in September 1982, based in San Jose, Costa Rica under the military leadership of Eden Pastora, an FSLN commander during the revolutionary war and initially the new government's deputy Minister of Defense.[3]

Amnesty International condemns as a matter of principle the torture or killing of prisoners under any circumstances, whether by governmental forces or non-governmental forces such as domestic opposition groups. However, the organization addresses only governments directly, as entities bound by international human rights agreements. Amnesty International takes action when governments are directly engaged in human rights violations and when they support or condone their perpetration by other agents. The organization may also take action with respect to abuses carried out by certain non-governmental entities which, while not necessarily recognized formally as governments, have some governmental attributes such as the effective control of territory.

Allegations of torture and summary executions of detainees by opposition forces

Torture and summary executions of captives by opposition forces have been reported on a persistent and widespread scale in every part of Nicaragua territory where these forces operate and in Honduran territory within the confines of their permanent base camps. Since 1981 such reports have been received on a regular basis with most allegations coming from the departments of Jinotega and Matagalpa bordering Honduras, and in the Atlantic Coast region.

Major military operations by opposition forces began in Nicaragua's western areas bordering Honduras early in 1981, with nearly 100 armed clashes and assaults acknowledged by government representatives during the first four months of the year. In October 1981 the first such actions were reported in the more remote, sparsely populated areas along the Coco River (the Wangki River in the Miskito language), which divides Nicaragua's Northern Zelaya from Honduras. The people of this nearly roadless area are primarily of Miskito and Sumo origin.

Between 22 October and 14 December 1981 an estimated 50 Nicaraguan civilians and military personnel were reported killed by opposition forces in the Coco River area, at least 12 after being captured, tortured and mutilated. On 14 December 1981 a state of emergency was declared in Northern Zelaya. The emergency, through Decree

[2] Although the formal announcement of the foundation of the FDN, in August 1981, named an executive board of nine (later four) Nicaraguan civilians resident in the United States, Colonel Bermudez was named its chief of staff, and some 40 former National Guard officers were recruited to provide its military leadership.

[3] ARDE's political leadership included Alfonso Robelo, head of the Movimiento Democratico Nicarguense (MDN), Nicaragun Democratic Movement; Jose Davila, former leader of the Partido Socialcristiano, Social Christian party; and Donaldo Castillo, a former leader of the Central de Trabajadores de Nicaragua (CTN), Nicaraguan Workers Confederation. In January 1985, after Eden Pastora's expulsion from ARDE, leaders of ARDE and the FDN announced measures to merge the two forces under a single command as the Union Nicaraguense de Reconciliacion (UNR), Nicaraguan Reconciliation Union.

118, suspended some civil rights, including the rights to habeas corpus and not to be detained without charge or trial.

Cross-river attacks from Honduras continued throughout December 1981, with considerable loss of life among the opposition forces and the civilian population. In one incident on 20 and 21 December, opposition forces briefly occupied the river town of San Carlos, which, with some 800 inhabitants, is one of the largest on the Coco River. Seven members of the militia captured in the action were subsequently reported to have been tortured, mutilated, and killed.

Others captured have reportedly been taken to bases in Honduras or Costa Rica. Amnesty International appealed to the Honduran authorities in December 1982 after lay church leaders Maria Eugenia de Barreda and her husband Felipe Barreda were seized by FDN forces while working as teachers near the Honduran border, taken across the border, and reportedly transported by Honduran army forces to the town of Danli where they and other Nicaraguan captives were reportedly held and interrogated. According to detailed reports from captives who escaped FDN/Honduran custody at Danli, the Barredas had been severely beaten. Other reports maintained that Maria Eugenia de Barreda had been repeatedly raped and was held bound and gagged. The bodies of the two were reportedly found near Danli several months later.

In some cases Nicaraguan and European citizens have been seized in border areas and taken into Honduran territory with apparent complicity or in some cases with the active involvement of Honduran army units.

International dimensions to abuses by opposition forces

The international dimension of abuses of the rights of prisoners includes both the frequent removal of opposition forces' captives to Honduran and Costa Rican bases and evidence that the armed forces of the FDN are supported, instructed and directed by agencies of foreign governments, including the United States. Assistance to these opposition forces by the Governments of the United States and Honduras introduces an element of governmental responsibility for the actions of the opposition forces.

The United States Government's role in the FDN's development was first formally acknowledged in early 1982. A November 1981 executive order was reported to have instructed that government's Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) to assist the development of the FDN as a military force (with a provision of $19 million in special funding for that purpose).

* * * * *

In September 1985 the FDN's titular head, civilian Adolfo Calero, responded directly to criticism of FDN atrocities by announcing the adoption of a "code of conduct" establishing norms for the treatment of civilians and prisoners. Amnesty International has not yet obtained a copy of the code or received information on its implementation.

Conclusion

In conclusion, grave abuses continue to be committed by both the government and irregular, anti-government forces. As for the government's record, while some advances have been made, the overall human rights picture remains cause for serious concern. With regard to the irregular forces opposed to the Nicaraguan Government, no significant improvement in the record of abuses has been recorded.

Amnesty International continues to press the government of Nicaragua to uphold its international obligational to promote and protect human rights. Specifically, we continue to urge the government to introduce the reforms necessary to ensure that the state of emergency currently in force does not further jeopardize fundamental human rights. In addition, we have made it clear in numerous approaches to the government that its responsibility is to ensure that those responsible for abuses such as torture and arbitrary killings are brought to justice.

While Amnesty International does not generally take a position on questions of foreign policy, the organization may address secondary governments in cases where opposition groups act with financial or logistical support from that government. In this regard, Amnesty International military assistance is concerned at the implications of proposals for U.S. military assistance to the irregular forces in Nicaragua. Specifically, it is Amnesty International's position that the proposed U.S. assistance should not in any way encourage or contribute to violations of human rights within the mandate of Amnesty International.

In a communication to Secretary of State Shultz in February 1986, a number of specific questions were raised in this regard. The relevant portions of the text of that communique appear below:

1. In the context of ongoing assistance programs, what measures have been taken to ensure that United States Government material does not contribute to gross violations of human rights, including torture or summary execution, by the member forces of the United Nicaraguan Opposition (Union Nicaraguense Opositora, Uno), which has received such assistance?

2. What manuals or instructions have been issued by United States Government agencies to assisted forces and what steps have been taken to review them to ensure that such manuals do not directly encourage violations of human rights?

3. Has the United States, as a party to the Geneva Conventions of 1949, taken steps in accord with its obligations to ensure that contending parties in the Nicaraguan conflict, whether or not involving United States personnel, respect the norms established for the treatment of protected persons under the conventions? Has the United States Government advised the forces it has been assisting of their obligations with respect to the "grave breaches" defined in each convention?

Today the future of human rights in Nicaragua stands at a crossroads. As U.S. legislators you can play a crucial role in determining the direction that human rights will take and making the promise of human rights a reality.

HUMAN RIGHTS IN NICARAGUA

(Testimony by Aryeh Neier, Vice Chairman, Americas Watch)

Thank you for this opportunity to address the question of human rights violations by the Government of Nicaragua and violations of the laws of war by the Nicaraguan contras. The Americas Watch has published eight reports on human rights in Nicaragua over the past four years; three of them include a discussion of violations by the contras. My testimony will include a discussion of violations of the laws of war by both sides, followed by a discussion of Nicaraguan government violations of political rights.

VIOLATIONS OF THE LAWS OF WAR

In our March 1985 report on violations of the laws of war by both sides, the Americas Watch found that (1) both parties to the non-international armed conflict in Nicaragua are bound by the provisions of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and by customary international law rules applicable to internal armed conflicts, (2) that both sides had committed serious violations of the laws of war, (3) that in the case of the Nicaraguan Government, major abuses were committed in December 1981 when its forces murdered 14 to 17 Miskitos at Leimus, and in 1982 when its forces killed some 7 Miskitos at Walpa Siksa and when they caused some 70 Miskitos to disappear and (4) that in the case of the contras, major abuses including killings, torture, and kidnappings have occurred throughout the conflict.

Attacks on Civilians by the Contras: The contras have consistently targeted and killed civilians, particularly those persons believed to be supporters of the Nicaraguan government or active in local government. The Americas Watch collected testimony from witnesses and survivors on 90 instances of contra killings of civilians in 1985, including the murder of a health brigadier and his 16-year old son at Cruz de Piedra in December, the killing of 3 people at Verdun in October, the abduction and killing of a farmer at Colonia Nuevo Leon in August, the kidnapping, mutilation, and killing of a young man and the robbery and murder of another man at Los Angeles in October, and the mutilation and killing of two men at Verdun in November.

In addition to targeted political killings and kidnappings, the contras have conducted indiscriminate attacks in which civilians are killed. One such attack took place in Somotillo, on February 16, 1986, where, according to the New York Times, "a landmine tore through a pickup truck carrying 17 civilians. A rebel band waiting in ambush then opened fire. Five women ranging in age from 28 to 70 were killed. A Swiss agronomist who had worked in the area for three years also died." Prior to this incident, contras killed seventeen mothers who were travelling to visit their sons in the military service and wounded as many as forty-three other civilians in two separate occasions in September 1984 and July 1985.

The recent capture and abduction of eight West German civilians by the contras is an illustration of a common practice over the past several years. On May 17th, the contras kidnapped eight West German volunteer construction workers and held them captive for nearly a month before releasing them. Evidence gathered by Americas Watch suggests that kidnapping of civilians perceived by the contras to be linked to the government or collaborating with it is a systematic practice. Some of those persons abducted are later found dead, others are forced to join the contras, some are "disappeared." (All of the foreign volunteers who had been kidnapped were eventually released.)

Attacks on Civilians by the Nicaraguan Government: The Nicaraguan Government does not have a policy of attacking civilians in the course of military operations, and the Americas Watch has not received testimony of killings or abductions of civilians in the past several years. The Americas Watch has reported two occasions in the past where there is credible evidence that government troops murdered civilians. One incident took place at Leimus in which government troops murdered 14 to 17 prisoners on December 22nd, 1981. Another incident of killing of civilians involved the murder of 7 Miskito Indians at Walpa Siksa in 1982. In several places on the Atlantic coast, 70 Miskitos disappeared after their arrest by security forces between July and September 1982. In spite of the repeated inquiries by their relatives, by the Moravian Church and by Americas Watch, the Nicaraguan Government has not yet provided any explanation of their fate and whereabouts.

In January 1986, there were reports that the Nicaraguan armed forces bombed civilian targets during a military attack in central Zelaya. The contra group, Misurasata, accused the government of attacking civilians during bombardment of the town of Layasiksa and stated that there were several deaths. The Nicaraguan Government says that civilians were not targeted but that the bombing had been directed against an armed contingent. Journalists traveling to the area established that, though the majority of bombs had been dropped on the outskirts of the town, two houses had been hit and residents of Layasiksa reported the death of a 13-year-old boy and the wounding of another child. The Americas Watch is concerned at the reports of possible casualties and the destruction of two houses, and reiterate that even given an armed presence by individuals who signaled their intent to engage in combat at Layasiksa, it was incumbent upon the Nicaraguan Government to minimize harm to civilians under the circumstances.

Disciplining Those Responsible for Abuses, Nicaraguan Government: Despite the insistence of the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights of the Organization of American States, the Nicaraguan Government has never shown that it conducted an impartial investigation into the Leimus killings and punished those responsible. It appears that Gustavo Martinez, a junior officer in charge of the security forces in Leimus at the time, and several of his subordinates, were investigated and served some time in military prison. A Subcomandante in the Nicaraguan armed forces told the Americas Watch in May 1984, however, that the investigation failed to establish responsibility for the murders and that the soldiers were punished for breaches of military discipline. With regard to the 1982 Walpa Siksa killings, we understand that the officer responsible for this action was summarily executed by orders of his superiors in the field. To our knowledge, there has been no satisfactory investigation, accounting, or punishment for those responsible for the disappearance of 70 Miskitos in 1982.

Disciplining Those Responsible for Abuses, Contras: To date, the Americas Watch is only aware of one instance in which the contras have prosecuted a soldier for a human rights violation. According to the State Department's reports to the Congress, there were 21 trials between May and September 1985, resulting in 19 convictions. Information was provided to the Americas Watch by UNO/CDH (a U.S.-funded contra human rights public relations organization) on 14 of the cases prosecuted (the other 5 were convictions for breaches of military discipline). Eight convictions were for contra violations against other contras; one was for growing marijuana; 3 were cases of property crimes against Nicaraguan citizens; one was a property crime against a Honduran. One case involved a multiple rape of several very young women by a soldier, the only one that dealt with a serious violation of human rights. According to UNO's own records and the State Department's reports to Congress, the contras do not appear to have punished a single case of murder, kidnapping, torture, or execution of captured soldiers.

Displacement of Civilians From Their Homes: The displacement of thousands of Nicaraguans, primarily living in the north-central zones of the country, has occurred during several years of war. The government of Nicaragua estimates that as of December 1985, a total of 250,000 persons in Nicaragua were displaced by war. We have received estimates that as many of 55,000 people were forcibly evacuated by the government as opposed to leaving their homes voluntarily. The Americas Watch has criticized the manner in which civilians have been displaced by the Nicaraguan Government. We have suggested standards that we believe should be met by governments seeking to relocate large groups of civilians: A government is obliged to minimize harm to civilians affected by relocation by: (1) providing as much notice as is reasonably possible; (2) providing reasonable transportation to carry out the evacuation; (3) providing assistance in moving personal possessions; (4) providing temporary housing for those being evacuated and (5) aiding families in staying together during the period of evacuation and subsequent relocation. Displaced persons testified to Americas Watch that they had been given less than 24 hours to leave and that they had not been permitted to take most of their personal belongings, recently harvested crops, supplies, animals, farm implements, or household goods with them. In some instances the displaced were forbidden to return home through the military danger ostensibly necessitating the move appeared to be largely over by January 1986. The displaced, many of whom had been housed on cooperatives and collectives did not want to be there, and when granted permission to return to their homes on the Rio Coco, about 10,000 did so in mid-1985.

Approximately 10,000 Miskito Indians left their homes on the Atlantic Coast this spring and sought refuge in Honduras. This is the largest exodus of refugees since 1982. The Indians exodus from Nicaragua came just eight months after the Nicaraguan Government granted permission for the residents of displaced persons settlements (who were forcibly relocated by the government in 1982) to return to their original homes along the Rio Coco. Americas Watch interviews with international relief workers in the area and the refugees themselves indicate that they were encouraged to leave the area by Kisan, an armed Indian group. According to the Christian Science Monitor of May 27, 1986, "As long ago as last December, refugees arriving in Honduras told relief officials that 'everyone' on the Rio Coco was going to leave Nicaragua. . . . To scare the Indians into leaving Nicaragua, Kisan spread rumors of an impending Sandinista advance, refugees said. Some Miskitos who had wanted to stay on the Rio Coco told relief officials that the rebels forced them to leave. Once inside Honduras, the refugees were met by Kisan officials, who kept them at rebel-controlled farms. Refugees said the guerrillas held recruiting sessions with the new arrivals before sending them on to UNHCR reception centers."

The Americas Watch conducted interviews in Honduras in early April 1986 and received testimony that Kisan was also preventing refugees from returning to their homes in Nicaragua.

VIOLATIONS OF HUMAN RIGHTS BY THE GOVERNMENT OF NICARAGUA

The Permanent Commission on Human Rights (CPDH), a private human rights group in Nicaragua, and the Americas Watch have compiled information about a dozen disappearances and killings out of combat during 1985. Some other "disappearances" are temporary, and relate to the government's failure to notify families promptly about the detentions and whereabouts of prisoners or the transfer of prisoners from one detention center to another. The Americas Watch has been calling upon the Nicaraguan government since 1982 to establish an effective system for promptly acknowledging detentions and for notifying families. CPDH has compiled information on four cases of extra-judicial executions where it appears that the victims were arrested by security forces before their deaths. In two of the cases witnesses reported that the hands of the victims were bound and that they had been tortured. The Americas Watch gathered information on two additional cases of extra-judicial killings. One was the October, 1985 death of Rev. Juan Pablo Pineda, the pastor of the Pentecostal Church of God in Guayucali, Esteli. Pineda's decapitated body was found bearing signs of torture. Lt. Rene Lagos, the commander of the military post who shot Pineda was arrested and sentenced by military courts to 25 years in prison. Another case was that of Zacarias Martinez Coronado, a 17-year-old agricultural worker who was killed in November in Matagalpa following his detention by police, apparently for draft evasion. Nine suspects in the death of Martinez were prosecuted in military court but charges were dropped for lack of evidence.

In October 1985, the Nicaraguan government amended its previous state of emergency decree. The changes provided the government with sweeping powers to restrict freedom of movement, expression and association; to curb the right to strike; and to intrude on personal privacy. Consistent with our position with respect to other countries, Americas Watch does not challenge the decision of the government to institute emergency measures suspending certain rights, as it is evident that Nicaraga faces a severe military threat. (Similarly, we have not criticized the Salvadoran government's decision to maintain a state of siege.) Nonetheless, however, we find that the emergency legislation has been abused, particularly with respect to freedom of expression.

In the first six weeks following the imposition of the State of Emergency in October 1985, the Nicaraguan government arrested hundreds of opposition political leaders and others suspected of opposition activities. Most were detained for relatively brief periods and released without charges. Mistreatment in detention consisted mainly of confinement in very small, dark cells; and the use of sleep deprivation and irregular feedings to disorient detainees.

Many of the complaints of abuse of detainees come from pre-trial detention facilities which are not accessible to international human rights monitoring groups. It is particularly important that prisoners held in pre-trial detention be granted routine private visits by the International Committee of the Red Cross, in the same manner in which the ICRC visits the facilities of the penitentiary service.

Popular tribunals (TPA's) were established under an earlier state of emergency in 1983 to deal with the more serious security related offenses. In 1985, there were 50 final sentences affecting 128 defendants. We continue to object to these special courts, principally on two grounds: first, their composition, which includes two lay persons in each court selected and removed by mass-based organizations, lends itself to political manipulaton of the judicial process; second, the lack of judicial review does not permit Nicaragua's independent judiciary to exercise any control to curb abuses of due process.

Since the imposition of the state of emergency, freedom of expression has deteriorated drastically. The editor of La Prensa has stated that more than 60% of the news copy submitted to the censor is forbidden as opposed to around 40% before October 15th. Furthermore, the government confiscated the first issue of Iglesia, a periodical of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Managua and the office of the Comision de Promocion Social of the archdiocese was closed down. At least one journalist for Iglesia was arrested and detained and interrogated for four days. The circulation of a labor newsletter, Solidarid was also prohibited in January, as was the newsletter called Prisma and three persons distributing the latter were arrested. Radio Catolica, the station of the Archdiocese of Managua, was closed down in January.

The emergency legislation also limits the activities of trade unions, political parties, and religious organizations: they are no longer authorized to hold outdoor meetings and they are required to obtain permits to hold indoor meetings. The use of short-term arrests in the first several months following the imposition of the state of emergency also impaired the ability of organizations to function, to attract new members, or to retain their current members.

CONCLUSIONS

Human rights in Nicaragua deteriorated during the past year. All the major parties to the conflict contributed to this deterioration: the Nicaraguan government, which stepped up its assault on dissent and further restricted civil liberties; the contras, who continued to murder civilians in violation of the laws of war; and the United States, which sponsored the contras.

TESTIMONY OF STEVEN M. TULLBERG

Thank you Mr. Chairman for the invitation to speak here today. It is a privilege to participate in this Senate forum with these distinguished members of the human rights community. My testimony will focus primarily on the situation of the Indian peoples of the Atlantic Coast region of Nicaragua, the Miskito, Sumo and Rama.

I am a staff attorney with the Indian Law Resource Center of Washington, D.C. Our Center is a non-profit charitable organization which carries out legal and educational work on behalf of American Indians. Most of our work is on behalf of Indians within the United States, but inceasingly we have been asked to assist Indian peoples in Central and South America who have been suffering some of the worst human rights abuses in this hemisphere. For over five years we have worked on matters involving Nicaraguan Indians and the Sandinista Government of Nicaragua.

A Nicaraguan Miskito leader in exile, Armstrong Wiggins, is on our Center's staff. We have worked closely with MISURASATA, a Nicaraguan Indian organization headed by Brooklyn Rivera whose offices are in Costa Rica. We also maintain contacts with a number of other Nicaraguan Indian leaders who are in Honduras and Nicaragua. Our Center was the principal complainant in the Miskito case in the OAS Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. We have also brought complaints about violations of Indian rights in the Inter-American Commission and before human rights bodies at the United Nations in Geneva against Guatemala, El Salvador, Brazil, Paraguay and the United States. Our Center is a non-governmental organizational with consultative status in the United Nations.

I accompanied Brooklyn Rivera on an official trip inside Nicaragua in October, 1984. During that trip we visited seven government camps for relocated Indians and several Indian communities. That visit was the first step of a peace effort between MISURASATA and the Sandinista Government. I served as a legal advisor to MISURASATA at each of the four rounds of formal peace talks which subsequently took place in Colombia and Mexico. Since May 1985 when the peace talks broke down, I have been involved in several unsuccessful efforts to resume talks to end the Indian war on Nicaragua's Atlantic Coast.

I am told that the Nicaraguan Indians with whom we work are called "traitors" by some officials within the Reagan Administration. After the peace talks broke down, the Sandinistas began declaring that our Center is a "front" for the CIA" and that I am a "CIA agent." Our Center has no connection to the CIA, and we have never received any government funds. I am neither a traitor nor a CIA agent, but I am a strong advocate of Indian rights in all countries of the Americas.

The intensity and the emotional character of the debate over human rights in Nicaragua is in substantial part due to the fact that the issue of human rights is seen as intertwined with the issue of national security by almost all parties involved. Because of perceived threats to national security interests, reports on human rights in Nicaragua are frequently colored and distorted by the left and the right, by the Sandinista government, the United States government and other interested governments, and by Nicaraguan Indian leaders who are striving to secure what they consider to be their own Indian national interests.

In this charged atmosphere we might take a moment to learn from others who have faced this perceived conflict between human rights and national security in other difficult times. We could consider the case of Earl Warren, the late Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who began his political career in California in such difficult times. As a government official he helped organize and implement the plan to forcibly relocate over 100,000 Japanese-Americans. At the time when the United States was entering World War II, after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, this massive relocation program had widespread support among almost all sectors of American society, including civil libertarians. Much later the Japanese-American relocation became recognized as one of the most shameful episodes in our nation's history.

Chief Justice Warren's otherwise illustrious career was badly stained by the abuses he had committed against Japanese-Americans. However, to his credit, he criticized himself in his memoirs and passed on to us some wisdom he gained through sad experience:

The atmosphere was so charged with anti-Japanese feeling that I do not recall a single public officer responsible for the security of the state who testified against a relocation proposal.

These [Japanese-Americans] who did not move by a certain date were to be confined to concentration camps established by the United States Government.

I have since deeply regretted the removal order and my own testimony advocating it, because it was not in keeping with our American concept of freedom and the rights of citizens.

It was wrong to react so impulsively, without positive evidence of disloyalty, even though we felt we had a good motive in the security of our state. It demonstrates the cruelty of war when fear, get-tough military psychology, propaganda, and racial antagonism combine with one's responsibility for public security to produce such acts.

"The Memoirs of Earl Warren" (Doubleday, 1977) pp. 148–49.

In that spirit we should discuss human rights in Nicaragua today. We should reaffirm that our fears and concerns about the national security of the United States, of Nicaragua or of other neighboring countries in this hemisphere must not interfere with our commitment to uphold human rights principles and standards. We must tell the truth, and we must always be willing to criticize ourselves.

A very important fact about human rights in Nicaragua is the existence of two wars: one between the government and the resistance forces of UNO, FDN, ARDE and BOS (the so-called "contras"), the other between the government and the Indians of the Atlantic Coast. The war with the "contras" has given rise to widespread human rights violations by both sides, and it has served as a justification or pretext for the massive curtailment of basic rights and liberties of Nicaraguan citizens.

The Indian war, however, is itself a war about human rights. It is a war of resistance being fought by the Indian population to defend basic human rights, particularly their right to their native lands and their right to the continued autonomy or self-government. It is a war which has been sparked and fueled from the beginning by the violation of human rights by the government against Indian individuals and Indian communities. The Indians are fighting not to topple the government in Managua or to reverse the revolution of 1979. On the contrary, they are fighting to give realization to the revolution for Nicaragua's poorest and most oppressed population.

Many of the early Sandinista abuses against the Indians are well-known. What is less understood is that the suffering of Nicaraguan Indians is still extreme and widespread. I will briefly summarize several of the most pressing human rights issues concerning the Indians of Nicaragua.

DEPRIVATION OF BASIC NECESSITIES

Reports we have received from visitors recently returning from Nicaragua include accounts of the lack of basic food supplies, the lack of medicines and medical care, and the lack of clothing, tools and all other basic necessities.

In time of war, we cannot say that every inconvenience or deprivation rises to the level of a human rights violation. Yet in this case the deprivations of basic necessities appear to be the direct and intended result of government policies. In our judgment, the Sandinista government is violating the basic human rights of virtually an entire Indian population.

FORCIBLE RELOCATION AND CONFINEMENT

Shortly after the MISURASATA—Sandinista peace talks broke down in May of last year, Tomas Borge, Sandinista Minister of the Interior, made a surprise declaration permitting thousands of Miskito Indians to leave the so-called "Tasba Pri" (Free Land) camps to which they had been forcibly relocated in early 1982. By the end of 1985, some 14,000 Miskitos had returned to their traditional village sites along the Coco River. They began the difficult task of restoring scores of villages which the Sandinista army had utterly destroyed at the time of relocation. They suffered from severe shortages of food, medicine, tools, shelter, seeds and all necessaries, but they were very pleased to be home. Through much hard work they began to rebuild their communities.

In its March 1986 report on Nicaragua, Americas Watch stated that this return of Miskito people to their Coco River villages had "brought to a close" the Indian relocation program. That statement is not correct. Some 3000 to 6000 Miskito and Sumo Indians remain confined in government camps in the Jinotega and Matagalpa regions of Nicaragua's Pacific Coast. These are the people who were forcibly relocated in late 1982 from upper Coco River villages. (That relocation came to public attention when a helicopter carrying 75 of their children crashed and burned, killing all aboard except the helicopter crew.)

These people are living in shamefully overcrowded camps where they pick coffee for the state at token wages. In a November 1984 op-ed piece in the New York Times, Senator Edward Kennedy wrote that these people were living "in intolerable conditions in forced-labor camps which resemble concentration camps." I can personally attest to the truth of that statement because I visited four of those camps in October 1984. Recent reports indicate that the conditions have at best remained the same and may have even worsened.

We understand that these long-suffering people are pleading for permission to return to their villages along the Coco River. We should work together to publicize their plight and to pressure the Sandinista Government to free them. Visitors to Nicaragua who are particularly concerned about human rights should ask for government permission to visit these camps, including San Antonio de Upa, Isla de Upa, Abesinia, and La Paz.

On the basis of information which we have gathered over the years from a variety of sources, we are more convinced than ever that the Sandinista program to relocate and confine Indians was motivated primarily by a desire to control a segment of the Nicaraguan population which was resisting Sandinista control and had begun engaging in armed conflict against the government. In essence, Indians were relocated because they were viewed as an untrustworthy population.

The Sandinistas themselves have made clear that their recent program to relocate many thousands of non-Indian peasant farmers on Nicaragua's Pacific Coast is at least in part due to the same motivation.

As human rights advocates we must never countenance forcible relocations which are based even in part on a government's determination that the class, race or group of people being relocated are suspect or disloyal.

SANDINISTA MILITARY OFFENSIVES AGAINST INDIAN COMMUNITIES

From the beginning of the MISURASATA-Sandinista peace initiative in late 1984 until January of this year, there was a marked reduction of armed conflict on Nicaragua's Atlantic Coast. There was also a marked reduction in arbitrary arrests, interrogations and tortures in the Atlantic Coast region during that period. In April 1984 a formal accord reducing offensive military actions was reached between MISURASATA and the Sandinista Government. Some Indian military field commanders extended this reduction of hostilities by signing ad hoc cease-fire accords with the government.

This limitation of armed conflict was punctuated on several occasions by outbursts of fighting between Indian and Sandinista troops. For example, in late October, 1985, there were ten days of fighting which was reportedly triggered by the killing of a Miskito man. This relative peace was very fragile because none of the underlying Indian grievances had been resolved, and because the competing forces had not laid down their arms.

On January 21, 1986 the Sandinista armed forces began a military offensive against the Indian forces. This new offensive was at first aimed at Brooklyn Rivera and a delegation of three North American Indian representatives who had accompanied him inside Nicaragua. It began with aerial bombing and strafing at the Miskito village of Layasiksa. According to reports we received from reliable sources, the Sandinista air force used Somoza-era aircraft and modern Soviet Mi-8 helicopters in the bombing of a number of other Indian communities in the region south of Puerto Cabezas. Sandinista ground forces also engaged Indian forces in this region, and this led to extensive fighting throughout the Atlantic Coast region for a period which lasted long after Rivera and his delegation escaped by boat to the Colombian island of San Andres. During this period, Sandinista military forces occupied a number of Miskito villages, and many Indian villagers fled once again to the bush.

In this recent offensive the Sandinista military forces demonstrated again their disregard for the safety and wellbeing of non-combatant Indian villagers. We have received reports of civilian casualties in Layasiksa and Wawa, but we have no total casualty figures, because the Sandinista government has imposed tough restrictions on travel in the area. It is only in the last few weeks that Sandinista military forces were reportedly withdrawn from the Miskito villages of Haulover, Wawa, and Wounta.

The Sandinista military knows it is fighting a popular Indian guerrilla force which receives much aid and support from their own Indian people. Today, as in the past several years, it is these same Indian villagers who have suffered most from the indiscriminate use of military force by the Sandinistas. Some of their villages are reportedly pockmarked by bomb craters.

THE RECENT FLIGHT OF MISKITO REFUGEES TO HONDURAS

As already noted above, many of the Miskitos forcibly relocated to government "Tasba Pri" camps were permitted to return to the Nicaraguan side of the Coco River in the latter half of 1985. Almost all of these people are now in Honduras. They began fleeing in January of this year as the fighting once again began between Indian and Sandinista troops. Perhaps as many as 1600 fled from late January to March 25. But most of those who fled, at least 10,000, left their Nicaraguan villages in a two week period beginning in the early morning hours of March 25. This is the largest exodus of Miskitos from Nicaragua since 1982. The total Nicaraguan Indian refugee population may now be as high as 35,000.

Sandinista officials and the official Sandinista press have described this latest massive exodus as a "kidnapping." Over the years the Sandinistas have repeatedly described almost all Indian refugees as kidnap victims. Even though the majority of these refugees are officially registered in camps run by the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, the Sandinista press insists they are being held captive in Honduras. Sandinista press reports state that conspiracies involving the KISAN Indian organization and the CIA are behind this latest "kidnapping."

We have used many sources to obtain information about this latest development, including the press, human rights organizations, Indian refugees who were part of the recent exodus, Nicaraguan Moravian church sources and others. On the basis of these reports we make these observations:

—The Miskito villagers returning to the Coco River were determined not to be forced once again into government camps. After some three years in the "Tasba Pri" camps, they were more fearful than ever of once again being under Sandinista military control. They were prepared to flee rather than be trapped in a situation which a Miskito man said was "like being in a hole."

—At first the Sandinista military stayed away from the Coco River villages. There was reportedly an understanding that Sandinista military forces would not enter the villages.

Only Indian fighters, most from the KISAN organization, were in the villages, and they moved freely among them.

There were a few armed clashes between Indian and Sandinista forces in the region near these villages in the early months of this year, and some of the villagers immediately began leaving for Honduras. Some went to Honduras because of the shortage of food and medicine on the Nicaragua side. Most stayed and worked hard to rebuild their villages, clear back the jungle overgrowth and plant their crops. The Sandinistas provided almost no food, medicine, tools, and other necessaries. Some humanitarian relief organizations and Sandinista-solidarity groups began trying to raise funds in the United States for these people.

A good bean crop was almost ready for harvest when the Sandinista military began a surprise offensive into a few of these villages in the dark of the early morning hours of March 25. The villages immediately affected were Bilwaskarma, Wasla and Kum. The Sandinistas fired some mortars into the villages and entered with ground troops and armored vehicles believed to be T-55 Soviet tanks.

Fighting immediately erupted between the invading Sandinista forces and the Indian fighters in the villages. There were casualties among the combatants and among the non-combatant villagers. Reports indicate that three non-combatant villagers, an elderly woman and two children, were killed by a Sandinista mortar in Kum and that one or two others were killed in Wasla. We do not have a comprehensive report on casualties. The Sandinistas said there were no casualties.

As word of the Sandinista military operation spread up and down the river, the villages began emptying. People gathered a few belongings and promptly fled across the river to Honduras, fearful of being again relocated or militarily dominated by the Sandinistas and fearful of being caught up in the fighting. Within a few days all but some 2000 had left.

The people fled because of the Sandinista military operation and not because of any plan or conspiracy to embarass the Sandinistas and influence the "contra" aid vote in the U.S. Congress.

Sandinista officials have not give a clear or consistent explanation of their objectives in this operation. It is not known whether they anticipated that the general exodus would occur.

In Honduras the situation has been very difficult for these people. In addition the problems they face as refugees, they face problems and pressures caused by political and military forces in the area which are very unstable and sometimes hostile. There are fears that the Sandinistas may strike at them from

The Sandinista Government has instituted its own "autonomy project" for the Atlantic Coast region, but it is a top-down, unilateral approach to the Indian rights question rather than the bilateral approach which Indian leaders are demanding. The Indian leadership wants a treaty or agreement rather than a statute or edict which Managua can amend or repeal at will. The government's autonomy project is now in shambles because there is widespread resistance to it, even among those indiviuals who were appointed by the government to autonomy study commissions. Also, the draft new constitution for Nicaragua has a provision which makes clear that that the Sandinistas are talking about respect for Indian culture and folklore but not fundamental Indian rights to land and self-determination. The peace talks between MISURASATA and the Sandinista Government broke down because the Sandinistas refused to negotiate over these fundamental Indian rights issues.

We see in the reports of recent developments that particular Sandinista operations, strategies and tactics have changed over time. But the character of the government policy and the resistance of the Indian population have remained fundamentally unchanged.

It is not easy to give compassionate and humane attention to these issues in the present climate of ideological polarization and military confrontation, but we must do so. In these difficult times we must be true to our principles.●

HUMAN RIGHTS IN GUATEMALA

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, recently the New Republic published a shocking piece on the extent to which the G-2, the Guatemalan military intelligence unit, has maintained its ruthless power despite the election last December of a civilian government. The two authors, Allan Nairn and Jean-Marie Simon, have covered Guatemala and its many governments for over 5 years and through their various sources, have presented a compelling case in support of an unequivocal denunciation of the continued abuses of the Guatemalan military machine. Notwithstanding Secretary Shultz' assurances in his June 6 letter to Chairman LUGAR that politically motivated killings and abductions have "dropped significantly," the Nairn-Simon piece, "Bureaucracy of Death," makes the case persuasively that any United States attempt to send military aid to Guatemala would be counterproductive and would in fact weaken Vinicio Cerezo's incipient democracy.

Mr. President, I believe every Member of the Senate would be well-advised to read "Bureaucracy of Death" and to ponder the implications of this article seriously. I ask that the text of this article appear in the RECORD at this time.

The article follows:

BUREAUCRACY OF DEATH

(By Allan Nairn and Jean-Marie Simon)

On the surface, Guatemala, the largest country in Central America, appears placid. There are fewer houses ringed with sandbags than in Nicaragua, fewer armed men in the streets than in El Salvador, and six months ago the country elected its first civilian president since 1966, Christian Democrat Vincico Cerezo. His administration has launched an anticorruption campaign and the country's first public-sector jobs program in more than a decade. But in this apparently hopeful atmosphere, union members, religious leaders, peasant activists, and other potential opponents of the Guatemalan military still face the constant threat of violence from their government.

In February Cerezo said that the country was experiencing a resurgence of political killings and noted that 69 cadavers, many of them showing signs of torture, had appeared during his first three weeks in office. In March the secretary of a Christian Democratic youth group was gunned down in his house along with his father and his sister. In April two refugees disappeared after they were dragged from a parish house where they were living under the protection of a Catholic bishop. In May, Victor Hugo Codoy, a member of the Congress's human rights commission, said that "it is very easy to recognize the same practices of years ago, including not just torture, but also the infamous coup de grace." On May 30 seven bodies appeared in one day on the streets of Guatemala City. Over the last six months, killings not attributed to combat or common crime have been running at more than 60 per month.

How to confront this ongoing terror is the primary challenge facing Guatemala's newly elected government. The victims are not killed by what is sometimes called "senseless violence" or by "the cycle of violence between left and right." They are killed by an efficient system of political terrorism. At the heart of this system is the intelligence apparatus of the Guatemalan military, known by its bureaucratic label, G-2. The G-2 is the unelected government of Guatemala that Vinicio Cerezo must find a way to control.

Cerezo is Guatemala's first chief of state in 20 years who would not order the killing of an unarmed civilian. He has a reformer's past and has survived three assassination attempts by the army he now nominally commands. But he serves at the suffrance of what is still the most murderous army in the Western Hemisphere. Although such estimates can't be precise, the archbishop of Guatemala, Próspero Penados, says that Cerezo holds 25 percent of the power. Cerezo himself claims 30 percent, and says that he will build from there.

From the start of his campaign, Cerezo pledged to limit the goals of his presidency. "My government will not plan social reforms," he stated bluntly, "because the army would oppose it." He promised to refrain from land reform and the prosecution of army officers for prior political murders. In return, he expected to be permitted to serve out his term, and said he would abolish the Department of Technical Investigations (DIT), a band of civilian thugs who killed and abducted on orders from G-2 and pillaged on their own account. The army agreed, and forged a tactical alliance with the man they had once reviled. The G-2, which is normally circumspect, even put the alliance on paper. Cerezo read us a confidential G-2 memo written before the December election predicting that the Christian Democrats would win "due to the links they have forged with the army, as well as with the United States."

Once in office, Cerezo fulfilled his campaign pledge. In a spectacular raid the DIT staff was apprehended en masse. It was the third time in Guatemala's last six administrations that this infamous corps had been purged. Almost 200 agents were fired, 400 were sent to a remedial police training course, and one was arrested on a weapons charge and subsequently released.

In the meantime, the military had taken steps to assure that its power could not be challenged by the new government. Four days before Cerezo's inauguration, the outgoing chief of state, General Oscar Mejia Victores, issued a series of sweeping decrees that stunned Cerezo's hopeful supporters. The measures narrowed civilian authority and legalized military control in the countryside, where the army is fighting a counterinsurgency war against a small guerrilla movement. One of the decrees created a State Security Council to handle aspects of national security that might fall under the jurisdiction of civilian Cabinet officers. Military officers serve on this council along with the civilian ministers, and their joint decisions are administered by the head of the council—who is required by the terms of the decree to be the army's secretary of intelligence. Another decree prohibited Cerezo from prosecuting any military officers for political crimes committed in the last four years.

Although Cerezo faces growing pressure to hold the armed forces accountable for their violence, he has been unable to comply. When Christian Democrats at the grass-roots level began joining the call for repeal of the amnesty decree earlier this year, Cerezo quickly squelched the move. This spring he announced that a commission would begin working on June 30 to investigate the thousands of disappearances, but was publicly pessimistic about its chances of getting access to secret army information. On June 5 he indefinitely postponed plans for the commission.

Meanwhile, the country's only human rights organization, the Mutual Support Group (GAM), is growing by the day. Modeled after the Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo in Argentina, the GAM is led by a group of courageous women whose husbands and children have disappeared. The GAM has publicly called for an accounting of the missing and for trials, such as those held in Argentina in 1985, of the officers responsible. Relations with Cerezo are becoming increasingly strained. In March he urged the GAM to "stop being masochistic and forget the past."

The army is confident that it has prevailed. "Do you think we've left behind any evidence?" one colonel taunted a journalist, demanding to be quoted. "In Argentina there are witnesses, there are books, there are films, there is proof. Here in Guatemala there is none of that. Here there are no survivors." This belief is widely shared in Guatemala and in Washington. But, inconveniently for many, it is not true. In fact, there are survivors and people on the inisde who will talk, including high-ranking officers and the street-level killers they command. There are still many obstacles to justice for the Guatemalan military, but lack of evidence is not among them.

"We are in a war," explained Colonel Edgar Djalma, a G-2 veteran who served as army spokesman for most of the time from 1979 to 1984. "If under that concept it means that the government has an apparatus dedicated to finding and eliminating people of the left, to me that is perfectly normal." Djalma said that "a government can use all existing forces: the army, the police, the treasury police. . . . Each chief of government may look to another repressive apparatus or create his own." The point, he stressed, is the importance of G-2 coordination. He showed us a 1980 memo in which he wrote: "In the first phase, the intelligence section should be used above all prior to repressive actions or clean-up operations."

Djalma's matter-of-fact description is confirmed by General Benedicto Lucas Garcia, the flamboyant and blunt former army chief of staff and brother of an ex-president. "If the G-2 wants to kill you they kill you," Benedicto told us. "They send out one of their trucks with a hit squad, and that's it." Benedicto says he knows that when his brother, General Romeo Lucas Garcia, was president from 1978 to 1982, the government was responsible for at least 70 percent of the assassinations and disappearances.

Benedicto blamed some of the violence on common criminals and the guerrillas. The insurgents, organized in three major groups, have several thousand armed combatants operating primarily in remote rural areas. "When they've eliminated people," Benedicto said, "they've said so." Last year one Western intelligence official told us that the guerrillas "have been selective. They direct their killings toward the army, security forces, and, to a lesser extent, the civil patrols." The State Department's most recent human rights report estimated that the guerrillas had assassinated 59 military officials and 33 members of the civil defense forces last year. There were a total of 304 "civilian non-combatant deaths" in the entire country in 1985 (fewer than reported by Amnesty International, the Organization of American States, and other human rights groups), according to the State Department. The report included accounts attributing 28 of these killings to the guerrillas.

Benedicto claims that most of the killings during his brother's administration were directed by his brother's top aides, not by Romeo Lucas himself. But Raul García Granados, a cousin of the Lucas brothers and Romeo Lucas's chief adviser, makes no attempt to avoid responsibility. He explained to us that "the death squads were organized under the patronage and the approval of the government and the army, because it was the only way to fight guerrillas. The [death squads] have the sympathy of most of the Guatemalan people. They have lists of people that are suspected to be communists of whatever kind," he said, "and they kill them."

The lists and the philosophy behind them date back to 1954, when a CIA-sponsored invasion overthrew the left-leaning government of Jacobo Arbenz, which instituted a land reform program and was supported by the communists. The army sifted through the confiscated membership records of labor, peasant, and professional groups that had supported Arbenz, and classified 70,000 people as communists. During the 1960s dossiers from the updated files were used by the armed forces to destroy a left-wing guerrilla movement and other opponents. In 1968 Time magazine reported the chief of the U.S. military mission, Colonel John Webber, as saying that paramilitary groups run by the army were "licensed to kill peasants whom they considered guerrillas or 'potential guerrillas.'" By 1979, the National Police were brazen enough to issue a press release announcing that between January and October of that year "1,224 criminals" had been killed by El Escuadron de la Muerte (the Death Squad), and 3,252 "subversives" by the Ejército Secreto Anticómunista (Secret Anticommunist Army). Throughout the early 1980s the army's top officers continued their assault on those they defined as the enemies of national security. In 1983 chief of state General Mejía Víctores condemned the Guatemalan priesthood for "advocating totalitarian doctrines." Twenty-four hours later Father Augusto Ramírez Monasterio, a Franciscan superior, was shot in the back as he fled an armed forces van that had followed him from his mother's house.

This is the military of which Cerezo, as commander in chief, now ostensibly has control. In a series of recent interviews, a veteran of the high command who has held senior army posts since 1978 described how the Guatemalan system works today. Western intelligence officials and other high-ranking Guatemalan officers have offered similar accounts. This officer says that each of the country's military bases has a G-2 office whose function is "the elimination of individuals." These offices report to the G-2 control center in the National Palace. The G-2 in turn is overseen by the Army General Staff and ultimately by the minister of defense. Altogether G-2 employs more than 2,000 agents nationwide, including about 100 full-time officers. The G-2 staff can also call on the resources of any branch of the army and security forces.

"There's an archive and computer file on journalists, students, leaders, people of the left, politicians, and so on," the officer says. This archive is maintained in the G-2 offices on the fourth-floor terrace of the National Palace, with copies in the adjacent Presidential Annex. "The file will say where the person was born, what party he belongs to, and the most important incidents of his life. One, for example, will say: '1957, participated in such and such a worker's movement; 1960, went into exile for the following reason; 1972, returned to Guatemala; 1975, participated in demonstration in the university. And finally, died on such and such a date.' It never says who was responsible."

The bureaucratic procedures for approving the killing of a dissident are well-established. "A local military commander has someone they think is a problem," the officer explains. "So they speak with G-2, and G-2 consults its own archives and information from its agents and the police and, if all coincide, it passes along a direct proposition to the minister of defense. They say, 'We have analyzed the case of such and such a person in depth and this person is responsible for the following acts and we recommend that we execute them.'"

The G-2 officers can also make their own recommendations. "There is a weekly meeting of the chiefs of the General Staff, and they do an analysis of the [political] situation which is presented to the chief of staff," the officer says. "They give a political appreciation. Such and such a union is moving, who's behind it, who is the head. Then the decision is taken, 'All right, we'll proceed.'"

Prominent political dissidents get special consideration. "When there is a big fish, G-2 makes a presentation, they review all the problems with the person, the objective of the mission, and their recommendation. They can give three options—disappear them, eliminate them in public, or simply invite them to leave the country. . . ." During the regime of General Mejía, for example, army chief of staff Rodolfo Lobos Zamora, presidential chief of staff Pablo Nuila Hub, and Mejía himself often presided at the meetings, according to this officer and others.

At high-level meetings such as these, the military decided in 1979 to assassinate the country's two leading democratic politicians. The first was Alberto Fuentes Mohr, the former foreign minister. He was machine-gunned to death as he drove by a military base in Guatemala City shortly after registering his new Social Democratic Party. Two months later, Manuel Colom Argueta, the charismatic former mayor of the capital, was slain in downtown traffic while a helicopter hovered overhead. Only one week earlier, Colom Argueta had registered his own new center-left political party.

Colonel Djalma says that he personally worked on the G-2 investigation of Fuentes Mohr, which concluded he was a communist. But Djalma says the decision to kill Fuentes Mohr was made at a higher level. According to two ranking officers who participated in the discussions, the plans to kill the two politicians were relayed by General David Cancinos, who was then minister of defense and overseen by Colonel Hector Montalvan, who was presidential chief of staff. Montalvan declined to comment on the charge. Montalvan's chief aide at the time was an officer named Edgar Godoy Gaitan. Earlier this year, the army appointed Colonel Godoy to be commander of the G-2.

Beatriz Barrios's name has been in G-2 files for several years. A schoolteacher and a law student, she had been picked up by the army twice in the last five years. Both times she was freed after the intervention of a relative who is a high-ranking military officer. After the second abduction, she had gone to the Canadian Embassy, which was quietly running a refuge program that had spirited dozens out of the country. The Canadians moved quickly to book her on a flight to Toronto.

At the airport her reservation passed across the desk of a colonel in the G-2 section named Gilberto Barreda, who has an office in a modest cubicle off the passenger arrival corridor. Barrios was due to leave the country early on the morning of December 11. Hours before her scheduled departure, she phoned for a taxi from a friend's house. Either the cab was followed from the friend's house or the call was monitored over the G-2 intercept lines at the national phone company. Ten minutes into the ride, the taxi was pulled over. Barrios was dragged away by four heavily armed men.

The next morning a G-2 army captain named Armando Villegas was seen by a group of his colleagues by the side of a highway south of the capital standing over Barrios's naked and multilated body. A note in Villegas's handwriting had been placed on the corpse, saying, "Faltan Mas"—"More to come." After the killing, Captain Villegas was made a director of Cerezo's presidential guard. His superior at the time, General Jaime Hernandez, has been chosen by the army as Cerezo's minister of defense.

One common assumption in Guatemala and the United States is that all the disappeared are dead. Clearly, most are. According to Amnesty International, "many thousands" have disappeared in recent years; the army admits to no political prisoners. But testimony of survivors and G-2 officials indicates that between capture and execution dozens and perhaps as many as a hundred desaparecidos can be found at any given time in the network of clandestine G-2 holding centers.

These centers range from ordinary-looking civilian homes to cordoned-off sectors of army bases. For example, a tree-shaded mansion at 5-15 Seventh Ave., Zone 9, in the capital was used in 1983 as a secret prison and interrogation center. As of early 1986, desaparecidos were being held at the headquarters of a security force called the Ambulant Military Police (PMA) outside the capital. The prisoners were held in cells hidden behind a concealed door in a building next to the soccer field. Another center, in operation at least until Cerezo's election, is located in the mountains of the Atlantic coast outside the town of Playa Grande, according to agents who have worked there as guards.

All legal efforts to learn the location of G-2 centers have been thwarted. Last September the mother of Fernando de la Roca Elias was able to record the license numbers of two cars used in her son's abduction. She went to the Guatemalan Supreme Court to force the government to release the identities of the vehicles' owners. In an unprecedented—and thus far unrepeated—decision the court ordered the government to comply. One car, plate P-75177, is registered to the Ministry of Defense, the other, plate P-253217, is assigned to the Cuartel General, the country's largest military base. Military sources also say that three peasant coop members from the town of Patzún abducted by a G-2 until last April 24 were still alive earlier this year and being held on the grounds of Cuartel General. In January the army appointed the commander of this base, General Héctor Alejandro Gramajo, as Cerezo's army chief of staff.

A few lucky enough to escape or be freed from the G-2 system have told their stories. Jim Boldenow, an American minister, was dragged from his car at gunpoint in 1982 and taken to a holding center where interrogators displayed a rack, electric cattle prods, and metal-tipped sticks they said were used for breaking bones. A friend of Boldenow informed the U.S. Embassy of the kidnapping, and embassy officials contacted then-chief of state General Efrain Rios Montt. He personally radioed the holding center and ordered Boldenow's release.

Last year a labor lawyer named Ramiro Ruiz Palma was tipped off by a friend that he was "on a list." He was able to have a contact within the government peruse his G-2 file. The G-2 had discovered that Ruiz Palma had advised a union at the Bank of Guatemala and made trips to Argentina and Mexico. They concluded that he was "a Marxist," and had marked him for elimination. He fled the country. Two weeks later, a union leader, Julio Celso, was snatched from a street corner and interrogated about Ruiz Palma's departure. Celso says he was taken to a house downtown, where he could hear prisoners screaming in other rooms. Celso was strapped to a blood-soaked mattress and threatened with a syringe. Only pressure on the army from friends in the U.S. labor movement secured Celso's release 24 hours later.

A personal connection to a senior officer or G-2 employee has become one of the more valued relationships among the middle and upper classes of Guatemala City. Only they can let relatives know the status of disappeared persons, how they are faring in clandestine detention, and when they are executed. For example, the mother of an agronomist named Jorge Rosal Paz, who disappeared in 1985, was consoled to receive from her G-2 contact at least a memento of her son: his identity card photo.

A few are still willing to speak out publicly against the system of political violence. "They [the military] have created a climate of terror," says Archbishop Próspero Penados, "a form of psychological torture, of constant uncertainty." Since becoming the country's leading bishop in 1984, Penados has boldly denounced the army for a number of specific killings. Nonetheless, Penados rations his public candor and keeps his distance from the GAM, the outspoken human rights group. "In Guatemala, one has to be very careful what one says," he explains. "One walks around with the knowledge that they can kill you at any time."

Nineth García, a housewife in Guatemala City, knows what Penados means. Her husband disappeared in February 1984. Afterward a squad of machine-gun-toting soldiers from the government's special operations brigade invited themselves into her house. They laughingly told her that her husband was "just a little bruised" and would be released in a few days. When he failed to appear, she helped launch the GAM in June 1984. The last two people who attempted to establish human rights organizations in the country were both assassinated. Today García, her eight-year-old daughter, and her fellow GAM survivors are the targets of frequent death threats. She says she now regularly receives phone calls late at night in which a tape-recorded voice describes her upcoming funeral and starts to laugh.

The GAM is the only group left in the country that will publicly confront the army. Last year General Mejia denounced the GAM as "a pressure group managed and directed by the subversion, and one that is making problems for the peaceful Guatemalan population." A police spokesman added that the group "has reached such extemes that it cannot be tolerated anymore." Nine days later Héctor Gómez, a baker active in the GAM, was abducted as he left a meeting. His body appeared the next day with his tongue cut out. Five days later, another GAM leader named Rosario Godoy de Cuevas, who had given a passionate speech at Gómez's funeral, was snatched from a shopping center along with her brother and two-year-old son. Her raped and mutilated body was found in her car; the baby's fingernails had been torn out.

When we asked General Mejia about the incidents at a press conference last November, he denied that either case was a homicide. He said that the Godoys had perished "in a traffic accident." When asked how the baby had lost his fingernails in a car crash, Mejia replied that the existence of that injury—which was witnessed and photographed at the wake—was "disinformation."

President Cerezo told us that he attributes the killing of the GAM leaders to agents of the DIT. Cerezo says he is "convinced that the decision was made at the highest level of the government." Military officials involved in the operation confirm this view. They say that a team headed by Jaime Martínez Jiménez, then the chief of the DIT homicide division, carried out the killings. They say he was acting on the orders relayed by Colonel Carlos Dorantes Marroquín, who was then the G-2 commander. Dorantes refused to comment about the GAM killings. Martínez, these sources say, was supervised by army lieutenant colonel Juan Méndez. This February, when the DIT offices were raided, Jaime Martínez was nowhere to be found. He had been informed of the raid in advance and chose to stay home.

It is hard to say who would be more stunned by justice for the Guatemalan military: the victims or the army. The officers and oligarchs who run Guatemala are accustomed to eliminating reformist challengers and dismissing the shaken survivors with gestures of amused contempt. General Mejia has explained the country's chronic violence as "a folkloric problem that began with Cain and Abel. . . . The problem is that nobody is content with anybody."

In a statement as bold as any made under previous military regimes, the army recently acknowledged that the killings of recent years had indeed been official government policy. Defending the decree that gives amnesty to all officers, the army said the measure was needed "to avoid reprisals against government functionaries who, with the framework and jurisdiction . . . of their public functions, may have afterward become the object of controversy."

Guatemala's bureaucracy of death appears more comfortably entrenched than at any time since the mid-1960s. The abolition of the DIT, a group of expendable civilians, has won the armed forces international praise, while G-2's assassinations continue as before. A popular civilian president can now renegotiate the country's foreign debt and secure economic aid for the country's ailing agricultural exporters—impossible under the previous military regimes. And despite earlier statements that he would tolerate no repression on his watch, Cerezo has yet to denounce a single army killing. This May his interior minister said that political murders are no longer a problem.

Cerezo surely would be far more willing to pursue prosecution of military officers if he did not feel that it threatened the survival of his government. If, for example, the Reagan administration publicly condemned the military's ongoing crimes, and supported efforts to hold the army officials accountable, the dream of ending the military's reign of terror would become a real, though distant, possibility. State Department officials claim that private diplomacy can work, leaving little prospect that the Reagan administration will go public. Yet still there is a feeling in Guatemala that unpredictable forces have been loosed and that the final disposition of the country's G-2 assassins is a story yet to unfold. At Cerezo's inauguration, angry crowds spat upon army trucks and shook their fists, crying, "asesinos!" In his first five months in office, Cerezo has received hundreds of letters—some from the friends and relatives of victims, some from government insiders—denouncing specfic murders and abductions, and naming the officers responsible.

After hearing the pleas of GAM members a year ago, General Meji replied: "You have stated that there are secret prisons—clandestine—and that your sons are alive. You have been given every means available [to locate them]. You can go wherever you like. Where are these clandestine prisons? Where are these family members? . . . I don't know where they are. When you find out, let me know."

The general may be getting an answer sooner than he expected.●

THE AFRICA FAMINE, RECOVERY AND DEVELOPMENT FUND ACT OF 1986

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor S. 2208, the Africa Famine, Recovery and Development Fund Act of 1986, introduced by my good friends and colleagues, the senior Senator from Massachusetts and the junior Senator from Wisconsin. S. 2208 responds to the urgent need for long-term relief, recovery, and development of sub-Saharan Africa. The United States of America has much to be proud of for responding generously to help the starving people of Africa in times of emergency. But I also believe that emergency relief efforts are not enough. Indeed, we need a long-term funding program for African famine relief that will help eliminate the root causes of Africa's plight by creating a situation of self-sufficiency and sustained future growth. S. 2208 is a step toward achieving of this goal.

I believe that when the problems of countries, such as the sub-Saharan African nations, are so massive and widespread, it is often hard to identify precisely what their most pressing needs are. This difficulty can sometimes be the cause of waste and an inefficient allocation of resources. With respect to S. 2208, however, I am confident that the objectives of the desired long-term development assistance have been well examined and thought out, thanks to recent studies sponsored by the Overseas Development Council and the Council on Foreign Relations and the Congressional Office of Technology Assessment. Also, in setting the objectives of this bill the knowledge or organizations such as InterAction—an association of over 100 United States private and voluntary organizations working in international development—which have a unique and thorough understanding of African development needs have been taken into careful consideration.

As my colleagues have expressed clearly in their statements of introduction on March 19, 1986, this bill is intended to be only a working bill, or first draft, which will create a point of departure for further efforts to solve Africa's famine problems. The United States has to prove that it is willing to support those nations which are willing—even eager—to enact changes in their economic infrastructures to correct these problems. I believe that it is through bills such as this one that other countries will recognize the United States' good will, and thus be prompted to join in our efforts. This consideration is of vital importance because Africa needs the help of a global and well-structured initiative, not the uncoordinated and sometimes contradictory efforts of single countries incapable of uniting their efforts to create a more efficient aid program.

Mr. President, it is for all these reasons that I strongly support this legislation and urge my colleagues to join me as cosponsors of S. 2208.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

THE PROPOSED SUPPLEMENTAL EXTRADITION TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE UNITED KINGDOM

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to register my strong opposition to the proposed Supplemental Extradition Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom. If agreed to by the Senate, this supplemental treaty will supercede the extradition between the United States and United Kingdom signed in 1972.

I commend the administration's effort to draft a treaty with an ally in an attempt to combat terrorism. It is vitally important that nations victimized by terrorist acts work closely together to better prevent and respond to future terrorist attacks. I also commend the Foreign Relations Committee's efforts to improve upon the language of the supplemental treaty that was originally submitted to the Senate. However, while the Supplemental Extradition Treaty as amended in committee is an improvement, it is still unacceptable.

Our courts have a distinguished record in extraditing terrorists. We should not sweepingly overrule their carefully considered judgments that deny extradition in certain cases. Yet that is precisely what this treaty seeks to do. I am most concerned that the provisions of this treaty will be retroactive. Approving this treaty in its present form may well result in the extradition of certain individuals who American courts have refused to extradite after the most careful consideration. Such a result would be similar to the enactment of a bill of attainder or an ex post facto law in violation of the principle contained in article I, section 9, clause 3, of our Constitution: "No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed."

I cannot support a bilateral international document that contradicts the general prohibition in American law against ex post facto laws and bills of attainder. Although there may be an exception to this rule in some cases, it is extremely questionable that we can justify breaking this rule in the cases of individuals whose extraditon has already been denied by American courts.

I therefore plan to offer an amendment to this treaty when it is offered on the Senate floor to make certain that it is not applied retroactively.

Although this treaty is touted as a blow against terrorism, I note for the record that neither the term terrorism, nor any definition of terrorism, is to be found in the treaty. It is vital, as we debate this treaty, that we define exactly what terrorists are, and what they are not.

I ask for the record whether our courts have behaved irresponsibly in refusing to extradite certain individuals so that it becomes necessary to overturn their decisions by legislative act? Have our courts failed to distinguish between the terrorist and the person deserving the protections of the political offense exception? The answer is "No." Our courts, operating within the context of current law and existing treaties, have served us well. The accused innocents have been protected, and the proven guilty have been extradited.

Another problem I have with this treaty is that it singles out Irish people, and subjects them to much narrower rules than any of our other treaties provide. Under this treaty, virtually all relative political offenses are eliminated. The political offense exception is firmly entrenched in American extradition practice. The United States is a party to nearly 100 bilateral extradition treaties. Each one has a provision that exempts political offenders from extradition. No other treaty, even those which have been recently concluded, contain the narrow political offense exception provision found in the proposed U.S.-U.K. Supplemental Extradition Treaty.

Mr. President, I yield to no one in my abhorrence of terrorism. Last August, legislation I introduced was incorporated into the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985 which called upon the President to negotiate a viable treaty among those nations plagued by terrorism to effectively prevent and respond to terrorist attacks. I sincerely want to promote cooperation with our allies to battle terrorism.

I agree with the opinion in the 1984 extradition case, "In the Matter of Doherty," which stated that "a proper construction of the treaty in accordance with the law and policy of this Nation, requires that no act be regarded as political where the nature of the act is such as to be violative of international law." Recent bilateral extradition treaties, such as those with Italy, the Republic of Ireland, Jamaica, and others, limit the political offense exception by excluding those crimes which violate international law. The supplemental treaty, on the other hand, seems to be other than a forthright effort to combat terrorism. It seems to be an attempt to address one nation's particular political problem—and to do so unfairly.

Offenses that fall within the scope of the convention for the suppression of unlawful seizure of aircraft, the convention for the suppression of unlawful acts against the safety of civil aviation, the convention on the prevention and punishment of crimes against internationally protected persons, including diplomatic agents, and the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, should be, and in most recent extradition treaties are, included in U.S. extradition treaties.

A better way for the United States to combat terrorism would be to initiate broader treaties on terrorism among nations that are victims of terrorism. A general multilateral agreement on terrorism would ease the way for bilateral extradition treaties.

Certain parts of the proposed Supplemental Extradition Treaty are welcome additions to the original treaty. Certain crimes, such as hijacking and crimes against internationally protected persons, are acts of terrorism that are covered by multilateral treaties and should be excluded from the political exception rule. As for those accused of certain other crimes listed in the treaty, I feel it is important that the question of whether they should be extradited should continue to be decided upon by our independent judicial system.

The courts merit our trust. I cite the case of Abu Eain v. Wilkes, 614 F.2d 504 (7th Cir. 1981), as an example of how reponsibly our courts have behaved and of how effective they have been in combating terrorism. In that case, the seventh circuit granted an extradition request by Israel. The court approved the extradition of a Palestinian who had set off a bomb in a crowded marketplace, killing five people and injuring many more. The court clearly stated that the political exception doctrine does not protect outrages against humanity such as random bombing "intended to result in the coldblooded murder of civilians."

Yet another major reservation I have about this supplemental treaty is based on my lack of faith in the court system used in Northern Ireland, particularly the infamous Diplock courts. These courts were created in 1973 under the Northern Ireland Emergency Provisions Act. Even before this act, the government introduced a new system of detention without trial. This controversial court system does not provide for jury decisions. Instead, one judge determines, on questionably gathered evidence, the fate of a defendant. Some say that the defendant's fate is predetermined. Some say that these are nothing but kangaroo courts. From the information I have seen, it would be hard to disagree. I am concerned that the proposed treaty will expose the innocent to the highly questionable practices of these courts.

Mr. President, this Supplemental Extradition Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom needs much work before I can support it. The Committee on Foreign Relations has made several helpful changes, including those that strike the British preference in the statute of limitations provision; allow U.S. courts discretion to deny extradition if the accused would be prejudiced by reason of race, religion, nationality, or political opinions; provide a rule of inquiry by U.S. courts; and allow defendants to submit evidence on conditions in the home nation and its court system.

Unfortunately, these changes do not go far enough. It is imperative that we remove the retroactivity clause and correct the other deficiencies I have cited. I would ask that the Foreign Relations Committee reconsider this treaty and rework many of its provisions before reporting it to the full Senate. Until this is done, I ask my colleagues to join me in opposition to this treaty and to support the amendment I will offer when it is considered by the Senate.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

LIABILITY INSURANCE CRISIS

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, the liability insurance crisis has exerted increased pressure on our ability as a free society to cope with the cost of litigation and to ensure against risks in a variety of fields. It is a crisis of the highest order, for it threatens both our economic well-beng and our sense of community and cooperation. When the threat of being sued is foremost in one's mind, a subtle but insidious change in one's attitude toward society takes place.

Recently, the Courier Journal in Louisville, KY, published two articles bringing to the public's attention another pair of innocent casualties of the liability crisis—Kentucky's Railway Museum and Madisonville, KY's traditional Fourth of July fireworks celebration.

Kentucky Railway Museum officials are not sure they will be able to afford—or if they can even get at any price—liability insurance after the museum's current policy expires July 15. If the museum is forced to close, thousands of Kentuckians and visitors to our great Commonwealth will be deprived of the historic treasures and experiences offered by this museum.

The Madisonville Kiwanis Club and Parkway Plaza Mall canceled their annual fireworks display for this Fourth of July when their fireworks, producer, Col. Wise Fireworks Co., of Louisville, KY, was unable to meet liability insurance requirements. The owner of the fireworks company, whose family has been in this business since 1871, said insurance premiums for his business have more than doubled and his business is off by 25 percent. Not only is Mr. Wise and his employees suffering, so are the thousands of Madisonville residents who are deprived of a safe fireworks display next weekend.

These are just more examples of the growing number of small businesses, municipalities, recreation centers, and nonprofit organizations suffering because of this runaway liability explosion.

Mr. President, I would like to ask that the Courier Journal articles entitled, "Insurance Problem May Soon Sidetrack the Railway Museum," by Glenn Rutherford; and "Fear of Liability Is Taking Bang, Fire Out of the Fourth," by Robert Barr, be published in full in today's RECORD.

The articles follow:

INSURANCE PROBLEM MAY SOON SIDETRACK THE RAILWAY MUSEUM

(By Glenn Rutherford)

Just when things were beginning to look up for the Kentucky Railway Museum and its 81-year-old steam locomotive, a liability-insurance problem is threatening to stop the organization in its tracks.

Museum officials aren't sure they'll be able to afford—or even get—the coverage they need for excursion trips when the museum's policy expires July 15. Those trips are vital to the museum's financial future they said.

"This could be disastrous for us," museum spokesman Elmer Vogel said. "We're really up in the air about what might happen."

This might mean that scheduled runs between Clermont and Bardstown on June 21 and 22 could be the last of the season.

Museum members spent 13 years restoring Engine 152, and they went into debt doing it. After a couple of highly successful excursion runs with the locomotive earlier this spring, the museum was hoping to use additional trips to recoup much of the restoration cost.

In fact, they were depending on excursion profits to operate the museum on Dorsey Lane in eastern Jefferson County.

All museum officials know for certain is that the museum's liability insurance carrier, Lexington Insurance Co. of Massachusetts, has decided against writing any policies for coverage of more than $1 million.

The Seaboard System Railroad requires the museum to have $3 million in liability coverage before it can use Seaboard tracks for excursions.

Museum President Alan Kempo said the present policy, which provides $3 million in coverage, costs $7,000. The company hasn't given the museum a new rate for the $1 million coverage they're willing to write, but "we expect that premium to jump anywhere from $7,000 to $15,000," he said.

Even with that more expensive policy, the museum would still need an additional $2 million in coverage before it could run excursions.

"We might be able to get the additional insurance on a per trip basis," Kempe said. "We think it'd cost between $500 and $1,000 a day."

The additional coverage would come through joining group policies issued to other tourist railroad or museum groups.

"But next spring, when those policies run out, what would we do then?" he said. "I'm trying to sound as optimistic as possible. If we can't run the trips, it's not going to be the end of the museum. I don't think. But it would certainly put us on hold for a while.

"We'd be left in a caretaker situation; about all we'd be able to do is cut the grass."

The public's response to Engine 152 "has been tremendous," Vogel said. "We've had people from all over calling us wanting to schedule trips. You know, after working 13 years to restore that engine, and after seeing the great response we've had to it, something like this is a real disappointment."

FEAR OF LIABILTY IS TAKING BANG, FIRE OUT OF THE FOURTH

(By Robert Barr)

With insurance companies demanding more bucks for the bang, Morton, Ill., Madisonville, Ky., and other towns around the country have decided they can't afford fireworks for the Fourth of July.

Associated Press bureaus report that the show goes on in many other cities, but at a higher price.

"We're in the same boat as every other community," said Diane Trezenski, the city clerk in Dunkirk, N.Y., "but we refuse to give up our traditions."

The Michigan Municipal League, which offers insurance to about 200 cities, discontinued coverage for fireworks on Jan. 1.

"It's a needless liability that we don't need to be involved with," said Bob Kish, an insurance representative for the league. "On the average Fourth of July we'll get eight or nine injuries, and that out of about 200 cities."

The annual displays sponsored by the Madisonville Kiwanis Club and Parkway Plaza Mall were canceled because their producer, Col. Wise Fireworks Co. of Louisville, was unable to meet liability insurance requirements.

"The last time we spoke with Col. Wise, they were only going to be able to furnish a bond, not a certificate of insurance . . . and that's not good enough," said Doug Berry, vice president of the Kiwanis club.

Cliff Wise, whose fireworks company has been in his family since 1871, said insurance premiums have more than doubled and his business is off by 25 percent.

In Morton, the village board and the Veterans of Foreign Wars post decided to cancel their annual show.

"As if people couldn't tell, we are awfully nervous about insurance this year," said board member Jack Bond.

Lack of fire insurance killed the "Skyfire" show in Reno, Nev., where a hot, dry spring has made the threat of brushfires especially serious, and the Rotary Club in Sierra Vista, Ariz., canceled its show at Buena High School after the school board required $2 million in liability coverage.

"The availability of that high a coverage is almost nonexistent," said outgoing Rotary club President John Sinclair, who is also superintendent of schools.

"No one can write a million-dollar umbrella—$500,000 is all, the best you can get. And you can't do it unless you're a member of the American Pyrotechnic Association," said Ray Stout, owner of Fireworks Productions, which is involved in several shows in Arizona.

He said Tempe, Glendale and Tucson cooperated by co-insuring or granting a waiver.

In Topeka, Kan., insurance for the annual "Go 4th" fireworks show won't cost any more than last year, sponsors said.

But the big show at the Kansas City (Mo.) Spirit Festival, July 3-5, was salvaged when the City Council lowered its insurance requirement from $1 million to $500,000.

The insurance industry blames the increase in costs on soaring damage awards handed out by juries. Trial lawyers and other critics accuse the insurance industry of greed.

The Board of Education in Lockport, N.Y., had demanded a $5 million policy this year from the Zambelli Internationale Fireworks Manufacturing Co. because of an explosion last year that frightened spectators but caused no injuries.

"It added excitement to the crowd," said George "Boom-Boom" Zambelli. The company, based in New Castle, Pa., is one of the rare firewords companies that can offer a $1 million liability policy, he said.

The Lockport board later agreed to accept the $1 million coverage.

"I don't think you can get $5 million coverage anywhere," said John Conkling, executive director of the American Pyrotechnic Association.

"To my knowledge, there has never been a claim paid out in excess of $500,000," Conkling added.

August Santore, owner of Garden State Fireworks, said his company will produce 125 shows this year. "Our claims average only about $700 to $1,000 a year," he said mostly for cars damaged by falling ashes.

Zambelli, whose company will stage the fireworks display at the Statue of Liberty festivities, said his company will produce 1,400 displays this year.

Brighton, Mich., canceled its fireworks after Christy Eilber, a 15-year-old spectator, was killed at the 1984 show.

Her parents are suing the city and the fireworks manufacturer.

"The one that killed my daughter was the size of the three-pound coffee can," said Dorothy Eilber, "I don't call that fireworks. I call that a bomb."●

OUR NATIONAL SYMBOL

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, a couple from my home State of Vermont, Chester and Burdys Page, have written a majestic song about one of our Nation's most elevated symbols—the eagle. Chester and Burdys asked me to help them gain recognition of their song which they call "Our National Symbol."

I do so gladly. Their song honors the eagle for its importance to this Nation as a symbol of our strength, and reminds us of its struggle to fight back from near extinction. The eagle is still an endangered species that must never be allowed to vanish from our skies through ignorance or neglect.

Mrs. Page has also written a story for children about the eagle to accompany their song. Used together, I think they could be a winning combination in our classrooms, and I would encourage teachers in Vermont, and across the country, to make them a part of our children's understanding of this great symbol of freedom.

It will be their responsibility to ensure the eagle's continued survival.

Mr. President, I ask that the full text of "Our National Symbol" be printed in the RECORD.

OUR NATIONAL SYMBOL

The eagle is our symbol
Of this we should be proud.
It's a great American heritage,
That we have been allowed.
He soars way high above us,
His powerful wings outspread.
The king of all the mighty birds,
With white majestic head.

Chorus:
Oh mighty eagle, God protect
For all the world to see,
Our Nation's strength he'll represent,
Until eternity.

He glides so quietly through the skies,
No noise can we detect.
Although he was almost extinct,
Our symbol we'll protect.
And from his lofty mountain top
With all his regal ways,
He shows he's king and master
Of all that he surveys.

Chorus:
Oh mighty eagle, God protect
For all the world to see,
Our Nation's strength he'll represent,
Until eternity.

Oh glorious eagle, in the skies,
Our national symbol strong,
America's proud of his great strength,
He's been with us so long.
So help protect our heritage,
In each and every way,
And keep our symbol always safe,
For the grand old U.S.A.

Chorus:
Oh mighty eagle, God protect
For all the world to see,
Our Nation's strength he'll represent,

THE OPENING OF THE SEQUOYAH BIRTHPLACE MUSEUM

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, this Saturday, June 28, Tennessee will celebrate the opening of the Sequoyah Birthplace Museum in Vonore, TN. This museum, the result of cooperation between the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians and the Tennessee Valley Authority, will memorialize the literary genius and profound contributions to the Cherokee culture of the Great Cherokee linguist, Sequoyah.

Little is known by the general public about this great man, even though his statue rests in the rotunda of this building. No great dramatizations have ever been made about his life; no movies, no television programs have been produced to publicize his work. In fact, most encyclopedias devote more space to the giant trees of California that carry his name than they do to the man after whom these trees were named.

Yet Sequoyah was a giant in our world. He was born in Tuskeegee, one of the historic towns of the Cherokee tribe located on the little Tennessee River, in about 1776, the son of a white trader and a Cherokee woman. He grew up in the Cherokee Tribe as a hunter and fur trader until permanently crippled in a hunting accident. He never attended school, but learned to read and write by studying mission-school primers. Yet, by 1821, Sequoyah had devised a syllabary, a set of 85 or 86 written characters representing each syllable of the spoken Cherokee language, bringing literacy to the Cherokee people.

Literacy in turn brought a constitution and a code of law to the Cherokee Tribe in 1827. And when the Cherokee Tribe was forced to move West to Oklahoma along the "Trail of Tears" in the 1830's, Sequoyah took his language system West, carrying literacy among the Cherokee people as they went. He died an old man, at age 83.

Sequoyah was a great man among a great people. The establishment of the Sequoyah Birthplace Museum is not only an opportunity to educate Americans about one of our early American heroes, but to educate Americans about the Cherokee people, both past and present, as well. The museum will house displays of historic Cherokee culture, and artifacts and documents relating to the work and contributions of Sequoyah. It will be run by the Eastern Band of the Cherokee Indians. Designed to perpetuate and preserve the history, culture, and antiquities of the Eastern Band of the Cherokee Indians, the museum should help to serve as a lasting tribute to both the Cherokee genius, Sequoyah, and to the Cherokee people.

Mr. President, the Sequoia tree, for being the giant among trees, has a very shallow root system. People often wonder how these trees grow so tall with such shallow roots. The answer lies in the trees' interlocking root system. By intertwining their roots, these trees have survived generations and grown to great heights. It is in this spirit of interdependence that I commend the Eastern Band of the Cherokee and the Tennessee Valley Authority for creating this museum. As Americans we must never be allowed to forget the importance of Sequoyah or the Cherokee Tribe to our national heritage. The histories of the Cherokee people and other peoples of this Nation have, through the years, intertwined, and we are the stronger for it.●

THE TAX REFORM BILL

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I supported final passage of the Finance Committee's tax reform proposal. I did so somewhat reluctantly, as I believe that bill can be greatly improved upon. There are many shortcomings in the committee proposal and it is my hope that some of these problems can be addressed in conference.

The most serious shortcoming of this package is the windfall it provides wealthy Americans. We have been led to believe that by closing tax shelters, this package provides great tax relief to middle income earners. This is simply not the case. The truth is that middle income earners will receive rather small tax cuts under the committee's proposal. At the same time, high income earners will receive tax cuts worth thousands of dollars. Indeed, some earning more than $200,000 could well see tax cuts in excess of $50,000. As pointed out so well by my good friend from Maine, Senator MITCHELL, this is truly a very strange version of Robin Hood tactics.

The Finance Committee bill does raise several billion dollars from closing tax shelters used by high income earners. However, the committee bill takes this money and transfers it in the form of tax cuts to the remaining high income earners who do not use tax shelters. Very little of the new revenue raised from limiting tax shelter losses goes toward providing income tax relief for middle income earners.

As I pointed out when we considered the Mitchell amendment, I don't begrudge anyone a tax cut. But true tax reform demands a greater sense of equity in the distribution of tax cuts than is found in the committee proposal. And maintaining a progressive tax system means maintaining an equitable balance of the tax burden among income groups. I do not believe that this bill upholds this important principle. I strongly urge the conferees on this bill to pay special attention to this problem.

Several other points concern me as well. I do not agree with the treatment of those who have individual retirement accounts in this bill. As I have pointed out, IRA's have become a central supplemental retirement program for many middle income earners. Given the windfall this bill is providing some upper income earners, it makes little sense to cut back on this program which benefits middle income earners.

I am also deeply troubled by the discriminatory treatment provided those States which rely on State sales taxes. Singling out the sales tax deduction as this bill does makes absolutely no sense. Either State and local taxes are deductible or they are not. This piecemeal dismantling of a time-honored principle does not bode well for the future of State and local financing. It is my hope that the conferees on this bill will restore the full deductibility of State sales taxes.

Finally, Mr. President, the delay in providing the bill's tax cuts is another shortcoming. This delay will result in tax increases for all income groups in 1987. Such increases will greatly diminish public enthusiasm for the concept of tax reform. Moreover, basic equity demands that if we are going to move forward on tax reform, we ought to do so now. We should not delay the benefits contained in this bill. This is particularly true when the bill contains several retroactive provisions. It is simply not fair to penalize some taxpayers retroactively and then drag our feet on providing tax benefits generated by this bill.

Despite my misgivings about this bill, I voted for it. I did so for some basic reasons. Our Tax Code is the most direct and regular contact many Americans have with their Government. An unfair, complex tax system is one way to foster widespread loss of faith in Government. Our present tax system has become so burdensome and so complex that we are seeing such an erosion in faith in our Government. True tax reform is therefore essential to preserving our faith in democracy.

The Finance Committee proposal moves toward restoring this faith. First and foremost, this package simplifies tax returns for many Americans.

In addition, this bill provides a greater sense of equity among taxpayers and within various income groups. For too long we have witnessed high income earners avoid taxation year after year. In 1984, for example, 3,000 individuals with incomes exceeding $1 million paid no Federal income taxes at all. This bill goes far in ensuring that all persons pay income taxes. In addition, the bill provides that individuals in the same income group will now bear more equal tax burdens.

While I am not satisfied that the committee proposal adequately provides equitable tax relief to middle income earners, the bill takes a step in the right direction. The committee package does eliminate many deductions that benefit only a limited number of taxpayers, add complexity to tax filing or invite abuse.

The committee proposal also focuses on those corporations which have avoided tax payment. Between 1981 and 1984, 65 corporations enjoyed net profits of $49 billion, yet paid no aggregate income taxes. Middle-income earners watched as corporations carried less and less of the Federal tax burden. Corporations paid only 6.2 percent of U.S. tax revenues in 1983, compared with 12.5 percent in 1980 and 26.5 percent in 1950. As corporate tax payments dropped, the tax burden grew for individuals. Individuals paid 48.1 percent of the Federal tax burden in 1983.

The committee proposal attempts to close some of the loopholes which will cost the treasury $400 billion in 1986. The bill contains a tough corporate minimum tax provision which should help stop tax avoidance by large corporations.

In sum, Mr. President, the tax reform bill passed by the Senate points us in the direction of simplifying and reforming our tax system. I believe we can do better toward delivering true tax reform for middle income earners. And I again urge the conferees on this bill to work toward this important goal.●

PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive formal notification of proposed arms sales under that Act in excess of $50 million, or in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon receipt of such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provison stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In keeping with my intention to see that such information is available to the full Senate, I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point the notification I have received. The classified annex referred to in the covering letter is available to Senators in the office of the Foreign Relations Committee, room SD-423.

The notification follows:

POLICY JUSTIFICATION

JAPAN—PHALANX CLOSE-IN WEAPON SYSTEMS

The Government of Japan has requested the purchase of six Phalanx Close-In Weaon Systems [CIWS], spare parts, and engineering support. The estimated cost is $70 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy and national security objectives of the United States by improving the military capabilities of Japan; furthering rationalization, standardization, and interoperability; and enhancing the defense of the Western Alliance.

Japan intends to install these Phalanx CIWS aboard surface are combatants to enhance its anti-air warfare capability. Japan will have no difficulty absorbing these weapon systems into its armed forces.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

The prime contractor will be the General Dynamics Corporation, Pomona Division, of Pomona, California.

Implementation of tis sale will not require the assignment of any additional U.S. Government personnel; however, one contractor representative will be needed in Japan for three months.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.●

A TRIBUTE TO SHERWIN MONTELL

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, on June 30, Sherwin Montell, Director of Financial Resources for the Social Security Administration, will retire from the Federal service. Sherwin got off to a good start in 1951 by graduating from Wesleyan University in Middletown, CT. After serving on active duty in the Navy, he signed on as a budget examiner with the National Labor Relations Board. Since 1970, Sherwin has been working with the Labor-HHS Appropriations Subcommittee, which I chair, as budget officer, and since 1979, as Director of Financial Resources for the Social Security Administration. It is a pleasure for me to join with Sherwin's colleagues in wishing him well in his retirement from Federal service.●

CONSUMER CONVENIENCE

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I would like to remind my colleagues of the benefits we as individuals and as a nation receive from the free enterprise system existing in our country.

Consumer convenience in America is a way of life. What could be more American than 24-hour convenience stores? Brand name competition, another American tradition, ensures quality and quantity of goods and services and is essential to our economy.

Compare this to the Soviet Union where consumer convenience is nonexistent. All goods and services are produced at the command of the state. The words quality and quantity are not in the state's vocabulary. Shoes and toilet paper are constantly in short supply and shops are full of items which are poorly built and not in demand. Consumers cannot even purchase a loaf of bread after 9 p.m.

No one in a free enterprise system produces because the state commands production, and yet the job gets done in a much more efficient manner. There can be no question that freedom will always be more productive than tyranny.

Mr. President, I ask to have an article printed in the RECORD which coincides with my remarks and gives examples to show that we do have the best economic system.

The article follows:

From The Idaho Press-Tribune, Mar. 13, 1986]

CUSTOMER CONVENIENCE? NOT IN RUSSIA

(By Lawrence W. Reed)

One of the most interesting publications I subscribe to is an English translation of articles from Pravda, the largest newspaper in the Soviet Union. Every issue provides a fascinating glimpse of life in an economy throttled by a corrupt and despotic state.

A recent one contained excerpts from a Moscow television broadcast. After the "Good evening, comrades," the speaker (let's call him Boris; his real name is not important and you couldn't pronounce it anyway) took up three pressing subjects of vital concern to the state: children's shoes, TV sets and buying bread at night. It was a kind of Consumer Reports for commies.

On the first matter, it seems that there is a serious shoe problem in the Workers' Paradise. Boris, a mouthpiece for the Ministry of Light Industry which is in charge of such things, acknowledged that "we are far from supplying the needs of our citizens."

Not only are shoes in short supply, but the ones that the state does produce are shabby and uncomfortable. Complaints are especially numerous about footwear for children, particularly that Soviet shoes do little more than "deform their little feet."

What did this red Ralph Nader advise the patient masses? Well, condensing whole paragraphs brings us to this answer: "We're working on it."

The ministry is burning the midnight oil devising new plans and documents to solve the crisis. One can almost hear the moan from 270 million Soviet households: "Yeah, sure."

Next, Boris read a letter from a Moscow woman who wanted to know, "What can be done with goods that are not in demand and which the shops and warehouses are literally crammed full of?" Now that's not a bad question, wouldn't you say?

Boris chose to answer it by attacking workers who put defective parts in television sets. "It would be a good thing," he says, "if the person who made the television could be sold that same television so that he could know what he had done to it."

The fact that store shelves in Russia are stuffed with junk is not the fault of the system or the government which imposes it. It's those doggone workers who don't follow instructions. Right on Boris! Go get 'em!

Finally, some citizens have had the nerve to question the hours that government food stores keep. "Why isn't it possible for comrades to buy groceries such as bread late in the evening around 2100 or 2200 (9 or 10 o'clock)?" asks one who came out of a theater one night and couldn't find a store open anywhere.

Boris let him have it: "It would appear that we must supposedly bake bread for this comrade and keep it until he has returned from the theater. One must think about bread in the morning before work, then do other things, and then go to the theater. But the comrade left the theater and then thought about bread. From this it follows that we must keep hundreds of shops with thousands of people open during this time and wait for him to come out of the theater and buy bread.

In other words, stick it in your ear, comrade. Lenin never said anything about 7-Elevens.

From my experience in visiting stores in the Soviet Union. I can certify that quantity and quality are not words in the state's vocabulary. The shopper's ordeal is complicated by little choice and often by the requirement to stand in not one, but three lines for many purchases—the first to select the item, find out its price and have your name put on it; the second to pay an unfriendly cashier somewhere else in the store and get a receipt; and third to go back and pick up the item and turn in the receipt!

Russia's two largest cities, Moscow and Leningrad, are plagued periodically by shortages of toilet paper. The advice to visiting foreigners is, "Bring your own."

The Soviet Union is a land where if anything legal gets done, it's because some commissar ordered it done. Decrees and edicts apply to and complicate virtually every aspect of life.

In free countries like the United States, a lot of people produce plenty of shoes, TV sets, bread, toilet paper and countless everyday items most of us take for granted. Nobody produces because the state commands it, and yet the job gets done in a far bigger and better way. That says something powerful about freedom and incentive over tyranny and the police.

In the United States, poor Boris would have to get an honest job doing something of real value for other people. It's called free enterprise and it shouldn't take a page from Pravda to remind Americans that it's the best darn idea since the invention of the wheel. And I'll bet dollars to donuts that whoever invented the wheel wasn't a communist.

PHYSICIAN PAYMENT REVIEW COMMISSION

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am very pleased to see that the new Physician Payment Review Commission, created by Consolidated Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1985, will include a representative of the rural perspective.

I was very alarmed when the Office of Technology Assessment announced the appointees to PhysPRC and failed to include a rural representative. At hearing after hearing on the issue of physician payment, concern has been expressed that the Medicare physician payment system may actually be a disincentive to doctors to locate in rural areas, and could limit rural beneficiaries' access to health care.

For that reason, I joined my colleagues in the rural health caucus in urging Jack Gibbons, the Director of OTA and the man who brought the Commission to life, to see that the rural perspective is represented as the issue of physician payment is addressed. I want to thank Jack for his sensitivity to the concerns of the caucus.●

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, by agreement, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act provides that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon such notification, the Congress has 20 calendar days to review and consult with the administration on the proposed sale. Section 36(b) requires that Congress then receive a statutory notification of the proposed arms sales and upon such notification, has 30 calendar days to review the sale. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In keeping with the committee's intention to see that such information is immediately available to the full Senate, I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point the notification which has been received. A portion of the notification, which is classified information, has been deleted for publication, but is available to Senators in the office of the Foreign Relations Committee, room SD-423.

The notification follows:

GREECE-PHALANX CLOSE-IN WEAPON SYSTEMS

The Government of Greece has requested the purchase of two Phalanx close-in weapon systems (CIWS), spare parts, ancillary equipment and engineering support. The estimated cost is $26 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy and national security objectives of the United States by improving the military capabilities of Greece in fulfillment of its NATO obligations; furthering NATO rationalization, standardization, and interoperability; and enhancing the defense of the Western Alliance.

Greece intends to install these Phalanx CIWS aboard combatants to enhance its anti-air warfare capability. These weapon systems will be provided in accordance with, and subject to the limitation on use and transfer provided for under the Arms Export Control Act, as embodied in the terms of sale. This sale will not adversely affect either the military balance in the region or U.S. efforts to encourage a negotiated settlement of the Cyprus question. Greece will have no difficulty absorbing these weapon systems into its armed forces.

The prime contractor will be the General Dynamics Corporation, Pomona Division, of Pomona, California.

Implementation of this sale will require the assignment of one additional U.S. Government representative and two contractor personnel in Greece for approximately three months.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.

SENATOR LEAHY'S SPEECH

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I rise today because I want to call the attention of the Senate and the American people to the remarks recently given by our colleague Senator PAT LEAHY to the Association of Former Intelligence Officers.

Senator LEAHY's wise leadership as vice chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence has given him a unique perspective to observe and reflect on the issues of congressional oversight of intelligence activities. I was gratified, therefore, when he stated his assessment that the intelligence oversight process has been effective regarding the annual intelligence budget, the quality of intelligence analysis, counterintelligence security programs, and routine administrative and organizational matters.

However, Senator LEAHY accurately points out that there are serious strains in the intelligence oversight process in three areas:

Leaks, and who is responsible for them; timeliness of notification to the intelligence committees; and, covert action programs, particularly covert paramilitary programs.

Mr. President, Senator LEAHY's speech reminds us that the American people must have confidence that Congress is conducting a vigorous oversight of the intelligence community to assure that our intelligence activities reflect the values and goals of the American people. In carrying out this responsibility the Intelligence Committee, on which I am proud to serve with Senator LEAHY, must balance the need for secrecy with the need for the rest of the Senate, and the American people, to know what our intelligence services are doing. There are some strains in that relationship at the moment, Mr. President, but that is probably inevitable in our system of separate powers and checks and balances. We should all be grateful that Senator LEAHY is serving as vice chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee because he brings experience, judgment, and very wise counsel to this terribly important and very difficult task of oversight of the intelligence community.

I urge my colleagues, and all Americans, to read Senator LEAHY's remarks and to continue the important debate on these critical subjects.

The remarks follow:

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT OF INTELLIGENCE—HOW ARE WE DOING?

(Remarks by Senator Patrick Leahy)

The question I want to discuss today is whether Congressional oversight of intelligence is working.

Broadly speaking, I believe the answer is Yes, particularly as it pertains to the intelligence committees' responsibility with respect to regular oversight of intelligence activities which could affect the rights of Americans. The answer is also in the affirmative regarding the annual intelligence budget and long-term planning, the quality of intelligence analysis and production, counter intelligence and security programs, and routine administrative and organizational matters.

But there are serious difficulties in the intelligence oversight process in at least three respects:

Leaks, who is responsible for them and what is the significance of the leak problem; timeliness of notification by the Intelligence Community of significant intelligence activities; and the role and handling of covert action programs, above all, covert paramilitary programs.

Unfortunately, there are few signs of the disposition on the part of key Intelligence Community leaders to overcome these problems by working cooperatively with the Intelligence Committees. Reflecting this, relations between the Intelligence Committees and elements of the Intelligence Community, primarily the CIA, have become somewhat strained.

Before going more deeply into the current problems in intelligence oversight, let me briefly review the origins and purpose of the current system.

As I am sure all of you know—some perhaps from experience—Congress set up the present intelligence oversight committees as a result of investigations in the mid-1970s of intelligence abuses. The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence was created in 1976 after conclusion of the Church Committee investigations.

Under Senate Resolution No. 400 adopted that year, the Senate Committee is to be kept "fully and currently informed of all intelligence activities." The Committee was charged with broad oversight responsibilities:

To authorize the yearly budget for national intelligence programs;

To evaluate the quality of intelligence analyses;

To review policies governing intelligence activities especially those which affect the rights of Americans; and

To be notified of all intelligence programs and activities, including covert action in support of U.S. foreign policy objectives.

Since its formation, the Committee has gone far in developing the groundrules for effective oversight. A major milestone was the Intelligence Oversight Act of 1980 (Title V of the National Security Act). It formalized the requirement that the oversight committees are to be kept fully and currently informed of all intelligence activities.

The Oversight Act also provided that the Intelligence Committees should be informed of "significant anticipated intelligence activities," including those that require a Presidential Finding. This, of course, refers specifically to covert action programs. it is also clear from the statute and its history that the requirement of prior notice was also intended to apply to other especially sensitive intelligence operations.

The Oversight Act also provided ways to protect the security of especially sensitive intelligence activities. Notice of significant anticipated intelligence programs can, in special cases, be limited to the Leaders of the House and Senate and the Chairmen and Vice Chairmen of the Intelligence Committees. Also, prior notice can be waived in extraordinary circumstances. Both these powers have been only very rarely exercised.

Surely, the most important security protection in the Oversight Act—and a very significant political achievement—was the reduction of oversight jurisdiction from eight committees to just two—the Senate and House Intelligence Committees.

Unfortunately, the latter protection has been eroding somewhat over the past two or three years. As certain intelligence matters have received more and more public attention, other committees have been expressing greater interest. Also, parts of the Intelligence Community have, when it suited their interest, themselves gone to other committees in an effort to circumvent opposition in the Intelligence Committee.

Cooperation in the protection of intelligence sources and methods has been excellent. The Committee has insisted on receiving the information, including some highly sensitive information, required to perform its mission. This is particularly true in our detailed annual budget review. On the other hand, the Committee has refrained from seeking information more detailed than necessary to support oversight.

The need-to-know principle is rigorously applied to Committee staff, and access to the most sensitive information is very tightly controlled. There is full documentation of everyone on the Committee—members as well as staff—who have had access to intelligence materials or who have attended briefings.

Until recently—aside from some well-publicized lapses, such as the mining of Nicaragua's harbors—the Intelligence community has done a fairly good job of keeping the Select Committee on Intelligence informed about developments involving intelligence. Far too often in the last year or so, however, we on the Committee have learned first of significant intelligence matters from the press—followed quickly by a breathless call from the legislative liaison office at the CIA, DIA or elsewhere trying to head off our angry reaction. This is of serious concern to me and other members of the intelligence Committee, and the source of increasing complaints.

Frankly, there is growing concern about the willingness of some Intelligence Community leaders to comply with the most basic requirement of the Oversight Act—that is, to keep the Committee "fully and currently informed of all intelligence activities."

Why does this concern exist?

Our current problems began with covert U.S. involvement with the Nicaraguan Contras in early 1983, and reached a peak with the revelations of 1984 that the CIA had been involved in mining Nicaraguan harbors. But strains between the Intelligence Community and the Intelligence Committee have been exacerbated by increasing press attention to intelligence matters generally.

The reason for this is primarily the widespread information on purported covert actions—including recent stories about Lebanon, Libya, Afghanistan, Angola, and other countries. There has inevitably also been a great deal of attention focused on the astonishing run of espionage cases during 1985—including the Walker spy ring, the Pollard and Chin cases, the disappearance of Edward Howard and the spectacular redefection of Vitaly Yurchenko.

The hemorrhaging of information about all these matters has caused anger, dismay and frustration, both in the Intelligence Committees and in the Intelligence Community.

No one is more concerned than I about these leaks of information about intelligence matters. Such leaks of privileged information threaten the foundation of successful intelligence and the integrity of the oversight process, as well as undermine national security.

What is especially disturbing to me is the perception that a great deal of the information comes from Congressional sources. Equally disturbing is the fact that this perception appears to be deliberately fostered by those in the Administration—and in the Intelligence Community, as well—who see an opportunity to weaken intelligence oversight.

In fact, I believe nearly all leaks of sensitive information come from the Executive Branch. This tendency to conduct policy debate or advance political interests through leaking classified information existed in the Ford and Carter Administrations. But in my nearly twelve years in Congress, I have never seen it on the scale practiced by government officials under the present Administration.

You do not have to be a great reader of tea leaves to see that most stories about alleged covert actions spring from opponents or proponents of programs who are located in government departments, even the intelligence agencies themselves. The many leaks about recent espionage and defection cases appear to stem primarily from jockeying among intelligence and law enforcement officials trying to protect their reputations in the face of public outrage over mishandling or incompetence.

Perhaps the most extraordinary leaks of intelligence information have concerned Libyan responsibility for international terrorism and U.S. activities against Libya. These appear designed merely to cultivate public support for Administration actions toward Libya, or to deflect criticism.

As for the Intelligence Committees, I am unaware of any deliberate unauthorized disclosure of sensitive intelligence information by Members or the staffs. I agree with the statement on this by Senator Barry Goldwater, former Chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee. In a speech on the Senate floor on September 14, 1984, he said:

"The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence has done a very good job of overseeing the intelligence community, and we have an excellent record on security over the years. Although some people refer to leaks from the Oversight Committees, they do not provide one single documented example."

Critics of Congressional oversight have, however, tried to blame leaks on the Intelligence Committees in order to attack intelligence oversight. Some officials are quite open about their desire to cut back on bothersome Congressional "meddling" and to reduce checks on the President's freedom of action in ordering intelligence operations, especially covert action, without Congressional scrutiny—and opposition. Their nostalgia, for the days before regular Congressional oversight is all too plain.

The rationale for this ill-considered attack evidently is a belief that intelligence oversight weakens the President's flexibility and effectiveness in using covert action in pursuing foreign policy goals. At its worst, it is an attempt to discredit the institutional guardians that refuse to countenance a wholesale loosening of the constraints on covert action and other sensitive operations.

The leak problem, while serious indeed, is, however, only a symptom of the underlying source of differences between the Intelligence Committee and elements of the Executive Branch.

The more fundamental cause of the current strained relationship between the Intelligence Committee and parts of the Intelligence Community is growing disagreement over the Administration's clear determination to make ever greater use of covert paramilitary operations as part of what is now being called the "Reagan Doctrine." In essence, this is a strategy of seeking to undermine Communist regimes through insurgency wherever possible.

Indeed, to call this new use of paramilitary action "covert" is a misnomer. The Administration makes no serious effort to keep this activities secret, and in fact appears to ensure that they become public as part of its larger strategy to roll back Communist regimes.

In identifying covert paramilitary action as a source of disagreement, I do not purport to speak for the views of other Members of the Intelligence Committee. I do believe, however, that whether or not individual members support or oppose particular covert action programs, the Committee as a whole is becoming increasingly uncomfortable with trying to shoulder the entire responsibility of speaking for the Senate on issues which are of such great foreign policy consequence.

Chairman Hamilton of the House Intelligence Committee has made clear his members also feel this problem keenly. Speaking of the press reports on deepening U.S. involvement in the Afghan and Angolan insurgencies, he said:

"I don't think it is wise to proceed on these highly controversial foreign policy decisions without the support of Congress. This is not a covert action in the ordinary understanding of the term, this is a war. That is the question: 'Should the United States enter into support of one side in the war in Angola?' It is a far cry from the sorts of situations Congress had in mind when it set up the procedure for handling covert actions."

The only power of the Intelligence Committees over covert action initiatives funded from the CIA Contingency Fund is to be kept informed—not to approve or disapprove. As watchdogs over the conduct of intelligence programs, the Intelligence Committees are not an acceptable substitutes for the entire Congress on programs that amount to U.S. involvement in foreign wars. In a democracy such as ours, a commitment of such far-reaching importance must be debated openly in Congress, with recorded votes so that Members of both Houses can be held accountable by the American people. There must also be active scrutiny by other congressional committees, including Foreign Relations, Armed Services, and Appropriations.

It is my considered judgment that the new reliance on covert paramilitary action as a normal instrument of foreign policy—even as a substitute for foreign policy—has strained the current oversight process to the breaking point. It involves a most basic question which can only be resolved in open debate, with the full awareness of the American people. That question is: Can a democracy like the United States engage in large scale, so-called "covert" paramilitary operations, using our intelligence agencies as instruments in waging proxy wars against the Soviet Union or its clients?

Very soon, if the Administration continues on its present course, we are going to have to answer that question. Failure to do so will make covert paramilitary operations a running sore in the side of the CIA, destroy the public trust so painfully rebuilt after the abuses and failures of the past, and force a complete reexamination of the present system of Congressional oversight.●

"SOAPY" WILLIAMS

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to an old friend, G. Mennen Williams. My feelings are mixed. I am, of course, delighted to honor a distinguished son of Michigan and a devoted servant of the American people. But I am sad that this tribute is given on the occasion of his coming retirement as Chief Justice of the Michigan Supreme Court. Chief Justice Williams must retire in December because of his age. Fortunately for us, he has no intention of retiring from his active involvement in the issues which shape our national public life.

If fact—despite a large and loving family to which he is devoted—public life has always been central to Chief Justice Williams. "Soapy," as he is affectionately called, was elected Governor of Michigan at the young age of 37. Inevitably, he was tagged the "boy Governor." The press may have seen his age; but the people saw a man with vision, with courage, with an ability to provide leadership—and with a green and white polka-dot bow tie.

The tie became Soapy's trademark. I guess any man who can tie one of those things—and he did tie it, he never used one of those clip ons—deserves the trust of the people. And Soapy had it.

He had the trust of Michiganders when he led our State for 8 years; he had the trust of Presidents who appointed him to the post of Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs; and he had the trust of the Senate when it confirmed him to serve as our Ambassador to the Philippines.

His involvement in Africa and the Philippines illustrates Soapy's belief in justice and freedom—a deep-rooted conviction that he continues to uphold. He was, for example, the first to advocate the adoption of "Africa for Africans" as a guideline for U.S. foreign policy; a guideline which might have prevented the current crisis in South Africa. And as our Ambassador to the Philippines, he provided ample warning about the nature of the regime which was recently deposed.

While the Federal Government may not have listened to his warnings then, the people of Michigan were always willing to hear his words and trust his ideas. His record proves that he had the consistent support of Michigan. After serving as our Governor, after serving in the State Department, he returned home and continued to serve us on the Michigan Supreme Court—a position to which he was elected twice. And he would have been reelected again had he not run up against the one thing that even Soapy cannot control—mandatory retirement.●

WORLD DEBT CRISIS

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, for some years now, there have been many dark clouds on the economic horizon which have largely been ignored by the administration, which has preferred to focus on the brighter aspects of the economy. The world debt situation is one of the storm clouds.

Currently, world concern focuses on Mexico's $97 billion foreign debt. Ever since falling oil prices triggered its latest debt crisis, Mexico has been seeking ways to reform its economy and secure further financing. It has sought to reduce its budget deficits, lower its 70 percent inflation rate, avoid recession, and stop the flight of capital from the country. So far, however, it has failed to find the solutions that will stabilize its economy and its debt situation.

While Mexico has struggled, this administration has failed to supply the leadership necessary to deal with the world debt situation. It has waited for the worst to happen.

Much has been said about the success of the Economic Summit in Tokyo this spring. It has even been commented that America resumed world economic leadership at that summit. This may be true by comparison with earlier policies of this administration, which refused to recognize any international responsibility which conflicted with it domestic policies. However, the fact is that the United States failed to secure Summit action on the most troublesome international economic issue—the world debt situation. The Summit offered an opportunity for the United States to enlist the help of its economic allies in dealing with the problem. It failed to do so.

There is still no evidence that the administration intends to lead the way in seeking solutions to world debt crisis. The so-called Baker initiative was clearly a step in the right direction. But many months have gone by and it has produced no results. Most analysts seem to agree that its $10 billion a year in new capital is not adequate. Yet, no further initiative has been forthcoming.

The United States has close ties to Mexico that should give it an urgent concern about Mexico's problems. More broadly as a leader of the free world economy, the United States has reason to seek world wide solutions. For this problem is not confined to Mexico or any other small group of nations. All of these nations—Brazil, Nigeria, Argentina, Venezuela, Peru, Indonesia, Phillipines, Ecuador, to name a few—are watching what happens in Mexico. Their future moves in dealing with their own debt problems will be influenced by what happens in Mexico. In fact, their behavior as members of the international economy will be affected by the outcome.

While seeking to solve the immediate issues, we must also promote long-term economic growth in countries throughout the world. This was addressed in a New York Times article on June 24 by Victor Palmieri, in which he comments:

The international debt crisis threatens to become a vicious circle. Given the right incentives, private capital can unbend the circle into an upward growth curve for the international economy.

It is important that we seek to provide these incentives and the climate in which they can work. Mr. President, I ask that the article by Mr. Palmieri which discusses this issue, be printed at the end of my remarks.

Resolving international debt problems requires the collaboration of many groups. The United States' first concern must be to provide the necessary leadership.

The United States should work with the IMF in setting reasonable rules applying to debt retructuring. Long-run solutions will not be possible unless the United States increases its financial backing to the World Bank, which it has so far failed to do. These actions need not increase deficits significantly. But they are necessary components of a long-term solution to the problem.

It must be made clear to U.S. banks that they must be part of the solution rather than part of the problem. U.S. banks must be prepared to offer additional credits—and perhaps even to accept some lesser return from foreign lending than they had hoped for. In the long run, it will be to their benefit.

This country must also work with our economic partners to encourage them, and through them their commercial banks to participate in providing financial resources. The resolution of international debt problems in something in which all members of the world economic community must participate. It is this country's responsibility to make it clear that it is shortsighted to do otherwise.

There can be no healthy international financial relationships, no mutually beneficial trade as long as these grave problems overhang.

The administration must aggressively pursue solutions with our allies, with our commerical banks, and with the world financial institutions. To do otherwise is to go against our own self-interest in a healthy world economy. To fail in this responsibility is to turn our back on our neighbor and ally, Mexico—as well as on our friends all over the world.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, June 24, 1986]

THE WORLD BANK AS BUOY

(By Victor H. Palmieri)

As the third world debt crisis grinds on, attention is moving away from short-run budget deficits in debtor countries to focus on their more deeply rooted economic problems. The International Monetary Fund was the appropriate multilateral agency for helping out with emergency financial squeezes. The World Bank is the sole agency with the knowledge and breadth—and, potentially, the resources and clout—to tackle this new phase of the debt crisis. This makes it all the more important for the United States to provide the Bank with more resources.

The Bank is assuming a central role in the debt crisis just as its leadership is changing. Barber B. Conable Jr., a respected former Congressman from upstate New York, will take charge on July 1 as president. Under Mr. Conable, the Bank will need to perform two pressing related tasks. It should provide new credits to capital-starved developing nations and advise them on ways to restructure their economies. But the long-term objective is to rebuild the private sector's confidence in the third world.

Alarmed at the collapse of many Latin American and African economies, and the rising failure rate of its own projects, the World Bank has already begun pushing many developing countries to reform their traditionally over-controlled and overly bureaucratic economies. Mexico is being pressed to allow more imports and to relax restrictions on private investment; the Bank is working with Ghana to reduce state intervention in agriculture; Jamaica is being encouraged to sell inefficient state-run enterprises.

These reforms require money, to cushion the blow to local firms and workers, to pay for increased imports and to finance new investments. Contrary to the hopes of some Reagan Administration officials, international capital markets are unlikely to provide much of this money in the short term. Commercial bankers feel badly burned by the debt crisis: many wish they had never heard of Peru or Zaire. Multinational corporations avoid depressed markets. And few third world countries have developed workable capital markets that can attract private investors.

For the moment, then, the World Bank will have to fill the gap, lending to developing nations in amounts well above those envisioned in the debt initiative outlined by Treasury Secretary James A. Baker 3d last fall. All the major industrial nations—except for the United States—have endorsed a substantial increase in the Bank's lending capacity. The Administration and Congress should join in this effort by passing legislation to guarantee the Bank as it floats bonds to raise the money to approximately double its lending to some $25 billion. This would require little in the way of budgetary outlays by the United States or any other government, but it would be critical if the Bank is to generate private capital flows.

In the short run, the governments of the United States, Japan, Britain and West Germany should also join with the Bank to encourage reluctant commercial banks to extend limited quantities of new credits and to forgo some interest payments when debtor nations agree to World Bank-approved economic reforms. It is in the interest of the commercial banks to help these reforms succeed by providing up-front financing. If such structural reforms were adequately funded, they could eventually make commercial bank loans to much of the third world a profitable business again.

For other developing countries where past debt obligations have become insurmountable barriers to economic recovery, commercial creditors will have to write down portions of their loans. Yet even these nations, if they follow World Bank guidance and restructure their economies to compete on global markets, will eventually be able to attract private capital.

The international debt crisis threatens to become a vicious cycle. Given the right incentives, private capital can unbend the circle into an upward growth curve for the international economy. It is now up to the World Bank to take the lead in creating those incentives and buying the time needed to introduce them. Facing this daunting challenge, the World Bank and its new president are entitled to strong financial support from the United States Government and the world financial community.●

FAREWELL, CATHY WOODS

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise to congratulate Catherine Woods, who will leave the Senate tomorrow to take on a new and exciting challenge with a voter registration project.

Cathy has worked here in the Senate for 16 years. She served two Senators from New Jersey before me, Senator Williams and Senator Brady. As administrative secretary in my office, she has handled a variety of tasks with efficiency and dedication.

Before taking on that post, she was in charge of the outer office. She was often the first person a constituent or other member of the public would see when visiting the Lautenberg office. She was always helpful, friendly, and calm, and provided the kind of reception that made constituents feel welcome.

In 1983, Cathy received a service pin and certificate for completing 12 years of service in the Senate.

Mr. President, staff come and go in the Senate. That is the kind of place this is. Staff people come here, motivated by a sense of duty and desire to serve government. They learn and they move on. Cathy was an exception. She was a fixture in the office of New Jersey Senators. Cathy shared with newcomers—including myself—the benefit of her experience, and Cathy saw many staffers move on to new challenges.

Now, after seeing many come and go, Cathy has decided to move on to a new position herself. I know she leaves a piece of her heart here. I know we will miss her. But, we wish her well in the new and exciting challenge that lies ahead.●

U.S. HOSTAGES IN LEBANON

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I join my good friend, the junior Senator from Illinois, in sponsoring a resolution in honor of the American hostages still held in captivity in Lebanon. Specifically, this resolution calls for a moment of silence at the official ceremony of the lighting of the Statue of Liberty's torch at the Fourth of July celebration.

Mr. President, the captivity of innocent Americans in Lebanon is a continuing tragedy. The United States cannot, and must not, forget about our hostages: Terry Anderson, Dr. Thomas Sutherland, Rev. Lawrence Jenco, David Jacobsen, and William Buckley. Some of these victims have been held for well over a year. The families of the captives have worked hard to ensure that their loved ones are not forgotten. They have had to endure psychological warfare as they never know what tomorrow will bring—from the lows of the murder of Peter Kilburn and the possible murder of William Buckley to the highs of the release of Rev. Benjamin Weir and the recent release of several non-American captives. We owe it to them, and we owe it to the hostages, to show that this Nation has not forgotten their plight.

There is no better place and no better event than the lighting of Liberty's torch to pause in remembrance of the five American hostages in Lebanon. Their captors have to know that Americans care about their safety and want their freedom restored. It is my strongest hope that the recent release of other hostages from terrorist captivity in Lebanon is a prelude to freedom for the Americans. The State Department must continue to press for their release in the most forceful and effective manner possible. Efforts must be made with the organizations and leaders in that anarchistic area of the Middle East to secure the release of the hostages. We must pursue all international efforts on their behalf as well.

Mr. President, I commend the junior Senator from Illinois for his sponsorship of this resolution. I strongly urge my colleagues to this important legislation quickly as a sign to the captors, the captives, and the captives' families that America remembers and that America still cares.

RENEWED COMMITMENT TO EDUCATION

● Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, in recent years, there has been increasing attention to the need for a renewed commitment to excellence in education in this Nation.

At the State level, efforts are well underway to reemphasize basic curricula and make other reforms to ensure higher educational standards.

At the Federal level, in spite of severe budget constraints, the Senate has judged education a high enough priority to boost funding for math, science, and special education in its budget plan. It has also approved an Andrews-Hollings amendment, which adds funds for other educational programs.

All of this is a good beginning. We have made some progress. But we still have a long, hard way to go.

The length—and difficulty—of the task before us has been demonstrated by the recently released Carnegie Forum report, "A Nation Prepared: Teachers for the 21st Century." This report, regardless of whatever shortcomings it may have, offers a dramatic and sobering picture of the serious problems in our educational system.

It is bad enough that more than 40 million Americans already are functionally illiterate—unable to read even the front page of a newspaper. It is worse that, in the words of the report, "large numbers of American children are in a state of limbo—ignorant of the past and unprepared for the future."

This situation must be remedied, for it is not just the future of these individual children which is at stake. The future of our Nation is at stake as well. For we cannot continue to remain strong and competitive—either in economic, scientific, or military arenas—if our children's education is inferior to that of children in other lands.

Remedying this situation will not be easy. Quick fixes, however well-intentioned, will not get the job done.

It will not be enough simply to raise teacher salaries or tighten certification standards. These and similar steps are important, but they are not ends in themselves. In the last analysis, we must restore credibility to our educational system. And we must restore to the teaching profession the status and esteem which it must have to attract the best and the brightest and keep them in its ranks for the whole of their careers.

This will require nothing less than a long-term, sustained commitment to quality education that attacks the problem on all fronts.

And to accomplish this, we are all going to have to get involved. Educators, parents, local, State and Federal officials, business, technical and scientific communities all can and should play a role in this effort. None of them can get the job done on their own. But the job cannot get done without the participation of each of them.

That is as it should be in a democracy, where the responsibility for shaping and directing the course of our society rests squarely on the shoulders of us all.●

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY SPEAKS OUT ON LAROUCHE

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, when LaRouchites Mark Fairchild and Janice Hart won the Democratic nominations for Lieutenant Governor and Secretary of State of Illinois March 18, I came to the floor to warn of the need to defeat these fascists. I spoke of my experience fighting a LaRouche candidate in New York, Melvin Klenetsky, in 1982. I was the first to have to face a LaRouchite in a Senate race. I knew that, if LaRouche and his followers were exposed for what they were, we would defeat them. And we did, but we had to empty our campaign treasury to do it. Since that time, Janice Hart has been arrested for disorderly conduct, and the Democratic Party is no longer ignoring LaRouchites. It has firmly and effectively led an effort to expose the LaRouche organization as an anti-Semitic, protofascist cult.

Mr. President, this past Wednesday, Paul G. Kirk, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and Laurence J. Kirwan, New York State Democratic Committee Chairman, spearheaded a New York State Democratic forum on Lyndon LaRouche and his organization. In his introduction Governor Cuomo told us that the LaRouchites have "Ku Klux Klan thugs hired as bodyguards." Larry Kirwan promised that the Democratic Party in New York "will continue to work with our national party and elected officials to expose the vile philosphy of the LaRouche cult."

In the keynote address, Chairman Kirk warned us that the political "education of the American people must never be ignored or taken for granted; political extremism of any form must never be ignored or taken for granted." Of the Illinois primary, Kirk said: "They won with the votes of too many decent, commonsense citizens who, when asked why they had supported these candidates, said, 'I didn't know who they were or what they represented.' "

I commend Mr. Kirk and Mr. Kirwan for their remarks and ask that they be printed in the RECORD at this point so that we might better educate ourselves and our constituents and expose the LaRouchites.

The remarks follow:

STATEMENT BY NYS DEMOCRATIC CHAIR LAURENCE J. KIRWAN

Democratic National Committee Chair, Paul G. Kirk, Jr., must be applauded for his strong opposition to the philosophy and extremism of the LaRouche cult. Lyndon LaRouche is no stranger to the politics of hate and deception. He and his supporters are also no strangers to the use of fraudulent techniques.

New York's Democratic Party has long fought against political ideologies laced with antisemitism and racism, integral components of the LaRouche philosophy. Mr. LaRouche's use of the name "Democratic Policy Committee" is a purposeful attempt to confuse the public into perceiving this extremist cult as part of the Democratic Party. It should be clear that we in New York have and will continue to work with our National Party and elected officials to expose the vile philosophy of the LaRouche cult.

Here in New York, we are not strangers to Lyndon LaRouche. The Democratic State Committee has worked hard to assist Democratic candidates opposed by LaRouche candidates. Our Governor Mario M. Cuomo has spoken out forcefully along with our senior United States Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan to oppose and expose the philosophy and tactics of the LaRouche cult. New Yorkers' join our National Chair in recognizing that the politics of hate must not be left unchecked. To those who choose to ignore LaRouche, we point to the lessons of history.

We endorse Chairman Kirk's approach. The National Committee has been working through state parties to educate candidates and provide technical assistance. Now the need is to educate the public.

Democrats have long been committed to protecting the rights of individuals having differing points of views, both within and outside our Party. But when those differing views seek to exploit and deceive the public, when they seek to divide our citizenry along ethnic and racial lines, we will do everything necessary to protect the integrity of our Party and our society.

In the final analysis, Democrats must do all that is necessary to protect the integrity of our Democratic principles and of our overall society. Two hundred and ten years of Democratic beliefs must be preserved and protected against subversive assaults such as those perpetuated by the cult of Lyndon LaRouche.

POLITICAL EXTREMISM: A REASONED RESPONSE

(By Paul G. Kirk, Jr.)

Within two weeks, all Americans will join the Empire State in the celebration of Liberty Weekend. The beauty of the Statue of Liberty—the symbol of America's basic principle—has been restored. We all look forward to a national celebration of our independence, our freedom, and our liberty. We will pledge our allegiance to these values. They are values we share despite our diversity. And we will pledge our fidelity to the responsibilities we share despite our individuality. We will pledge our allegiance and our fidelity to one another as Americans.

Whenever we have lost sight of that common bond as a people, we have foundered as a nation. When some of us refused to admit was stained by the scandal of Watergate.

Today, the American tradition and the American condition call out for a renewed commitment to common purpose and to individual opportunity. We do no honor to the birth of this nation if we stand idle while Americans divide under a new social Darwinism, a blind non-policy which permits poverty as a price of one's birthright and wealth as the reward for one's greed and elitism.

When the politics of common sense and common purpose are overtaken by politics of selfishness, threats to American liberty are inevitable. When people feel abandoned or ignored, and are left without hope in the daily struggle of their own lives, they search in desperation for easier answers. They are living in a vacuum crying out to be filled. They are vulnerable to cynical sloganeering, to simplistic solutions, and to extreme appeals to their baser instincts.

And when average Americans are not informed and their education as voters taken for granted, they, too, may be deceived by fanatical candidates or extremist cults whose purpose is to distort the value of true meaning and to pervert the meaning of true values.

Lyndon LaRouche is an extremist fanatic who distorted the value of true meaning and perverted the meaning of true values by naming his cult the National Democratic Policy Committee. Three months ago, two of his disciples, won nominations of the Democratic Party for statewide office in Illinois.

And they won with the votes of too many decent, common sense citizens who, when asked why they had supported these candidates, said: "I didn't know who they were or what they represented."

No one can undo history, but the Democratic Party must not permit that kind of history to repeat itself. For those of us in leadership positions in the Democratic Party—at the national, State, and local levels—the Illinois primary results were a rude—but valuable—reminder of two basic truths of political life in America:

(1) Responsing to the needs, the aspirations, the education of the American people must never be ignored or taken for granted;

(2) Political extremism of any form must never be ignored or taken for granted.

In the days following the Illinois primary, a close examination of Lyndon LaRouche and his extremist cult—by the Democratic Party and the media—revealed the classic hallmarks of fraud and fascism.

In a pattern not unlike that of a Mussolini or a Hitler, the LaRouchites have exercised political expediency by moving from the extreme left to the extreme right, indulging in Anti-Semitism and religious and racial bigotry, never acknowledging or accepting the fundamental principles of democracy—respect for the rights of others, respect for majority rule, and respect for civil—and truthful—public debate.

They specialize in hatemongering and hysteria, bilking the innocent and the elderly blaming the world's problems on LaRouche's conspiratorial villains which range from your former Governor Harriman to the family of your former Governor Rockefeller, from the Jews to the Jesuits, from former Vice President Mondale to the Queen of England.

Just as other totalitarians have sought to destroy other democratic systems from within, the LaRouchites are participating in American politics under clouds of fraud and false pretenses. The allegations are legion:—fraud in the raising of funds; fraud in the recruitment of candidates; fraud in qualifying for a place on the ballot, fraud in calling themselves a U.S. Labor Party; fraud in gaining political access at home and abroad; and fraud in calling themselves National Democrats.

As I think of what the centennial celebration will mean to me, I will think first of my grandfather—of how he must have felt, at age 14, just a little boy all alone, when he saw for the first time the "Mother of Exiles" welcoming him from the shores of Ireland.

Then I will think, of his son, my own father, one of 14 children and the father of 5 himself, and how he must have felt, upon his return from World War II, when he saw Lady Liberty standing gracefully and proud in New York harbor, of what it meant to him to be home and to have had to leave behind—beneath endless rows of crosses and Stars of David—sons, husbands, and fathers of every creed and color who had given their lives for liberty and for a campaign to combat and conquer fascism.

Our battle is another kind of battle, but our defense must be no less vigilant.

In every campaign since Illinois, the Democratic Party has sought to ensure that, before each primary election, no voter would be able to say: "Nobody told me who the LaRouche candidates were or what they stood for."

We have monitored filings in every state in which LaRouche candidates have sought the Democratic nominations. Even in districts where Democrats have done poorly in the past, we have fielded candidates to oppose them—not to debate them and give them political legitimacy, but to defeat them by telling voters of their political lunacy.

To date, our strategy has succeeded, since Illinois, I have devoted the Democratic National Committee's efforts to political action, and the LaRouche candidates have not won a single contested nomination for Federal, State, or local office. They have been defeated by the true Democratic Party in 85 out of 85 election contests. The Liberty we love and will soon celebrate is one which permits extremists like LaRouche, however freakish, however fascist, however fanatic—to exercise free speech in America's political process.

This decisive record of rejection of the LaRouchites by the Democrats at the polls may be the most effective statement that a political party can make to protect that process as a matter of political action. But, as Chairman of the Democratic Party and its National Committee—the keeper of the party's name, its integrity, its ideals and its traditions, I tell you, as a matter of political principle, that the LaRouche sect, masquerading as the National Democratic Policy Committee, represents all that is alien to the spirit and character of the true Democratic Party. They practice the politics of intimidation and harassment; the politics of prejudice and the politics of parancia; the politics of extremism and exclusion; the politics of fraud and the politics of fear. The Democratic Party of the United States rejects their tactics, their policies and their politics and calls on the voters of New York State to do the same.

It may have been only a fluke of history that so bizarre and extremist a movement has heightened the vigilance of the world's oldest political party. And, it is reassuring that the Democratic Party has been successful in repelling these fanatical forces during the past three months. But, it is critical that we remember and remain vigilant—not only against the LaRouche movement but against other extremist movements as well.

Political extremism in America did not begin with LaRouche victories in Illinois in March of 1986, and it may not end with the election results in September or November of 1986. The LaRouche movement is only a recent example of extremist cults that have capitalized on discontent, exploited fear, promoted hatred, distorted politics, and defiled the true meaning of liberty and democracy.

A century-and-a-half ago, the know nothings exploited the tensions which resulted when the "Mother of Exiles" first welcomed her newly adopted children. The know nothings whipped up bigotry against Catholic immigrants. For more than a decade, they brought hate to American politics.

In the aftermath of the Civil War, the Ku Klux Klan continued to terrorize blacks and succeeded in denying them rights they felt had just been won. In the 1920's, the 1960's, and even in the 1980's—the Klan re-emerged to attack blacks, Catholics, Jews, and other racial and religious Americans whose very presence has strengthened the diversity and, thus, the character of this nation.

The McCarthyites of the 1950's, the John Birchers of the 1960's and the LaRouchites of the 1980's may not have agreed on every issue. But they have shared a common view of the world—a belief in evil and all-powerful conspiracies, a disdain for the decent and nobler instincts of people; an impatience with compromise, majority rule, and with free and open debate. They have shared an intolerance for pluralism, diversity, and inclusion—the traditional practices and principles of American democracy, and the traditional values of the Democratic Party.

No Kahane and no Farrakhan, no extremists, no racists, no separatists, no demagogues who are not democrats with a small "D," will have any place in a party which is proud to be called Democratic with a capital "D." We reserve instead a place for those who sing "Sweet Land of Liberty" with the black preacher who dreamed of the day and died for the "day when all of God's children, black men and white men, jews and gentiles, protestants and catholics, will be able to join hands" as freedom rings.

During the next several days, the Democratic Party and most Americans will reflect upon and remember the true meaning of freedom and liberty and the true meaning of traditional American values—the abhorrence of prejudice, the tolerance of ideas and beliefs, the character and strength of America that is the very product of her diversity and pluralism, the freedom and fairness that is inhrent in the politices of representation and inclusion.

Since its birth, this republic has been the safest haven for those in search of political and religious freedom. The founding fathers came together from different ethnic and religious backgrounds. Though they built colonies with different needs, resources and economies, they shaped a government committed to the belief that we are one nation. Though they recognized that a foundation of religious and moral values would be essential to the survival of the new government, they built respect for diversity into its Constitution. They proscribed in its preamble that its purposes and theirs was to ". . . secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity . . ."

One of the blessings of liberty bestowed by this country and to be secured by us is the right and opportunity of any individual or group to participate in the American political process. But the right to participate in politics in America brings with it a responsibility to practice politics in the tradition of America.

In that context, and in anticipation of the nation's birthday, let me mention one other matter relating to the politics of our time.

A new wave of activists—many organized by or affiliated with spiritual or religious leaders—is becoming increasingly vocal and active in the American political process.

These Americans are involved in a good faith attempt to make their views heard. But the religious and lay leaders of their organizations could be truer to the very concepts their names represent.

Those who profess to hold dear the traditional values of America and call themselves the American coalition of traditional values would be truer to their name if their leader refrained from corrupting the traditional value of religious tolerance by declaring that catholicism is a "false religion" and that jews have brought their own suffering upon themselves.

Those who profess to honor the fundamental tenet of freedom and call themselves the Freedom Council could be truer to their name by refraining from moral absolutism and deeming less worthy those whose religious values or beliefs may differ from their own.

The issue of tolerance is at the essence of freedom, of liberty and of those values which are uniquely American. Our differences, our contradictions, our separate beliefs as Americans cannot be resolved by absolutism nor by denying their existence.

Democrats believe in separation of church and state which will allow any religion to flourish, to contribute to the public dialogue, to participate in public life without dictating public policy. We believe in religious tolerance not merely as the token toleration of another's faith, but as a precious asset of the American character.

If we are to truly celebrate liberty and freedom in America, we will all celebrate the right to believe freely and strongly in one thing while protecting the right of others to believe just as freely and strongly in the opposite. No American liberty is safe unless that American liberty is protected. It is our American political system that protects those liberties, and it is our political duty to protect that system.

The party of Jefferson remains true to the American and Democratic values of liberty and freedom, of racial brotherhood and religious tolerance.

From Thomas Jefferson, who wrote religious freedom into the laws of his state and nation. . . . To Franklin D. Roosevelt, who saved working America and helped it enter the middle class and achieve economic security. . . . To John Kennedy, Lyndon Johnson, and Jimmy Carter, who fought for civil rights and equal rights. . . The Democratic Party has stood for a vision of America as one nation, one people, with respect and caring for one another.

And today, that vision is no different. The Democratic Party is the party of common sense and the only party with a national sense of common purpose. It is the only political party that believes all Americans are in this adventure together, with equal and individual rights and opportunities, but with shared responsibilities.

The Democratic Party is, as it has always been, the political vessel for the hopes and aspirations of the average American. Democrats believe that individual opportunity and upward mobility, political, economic and otherwise, are reserved not just to the wealthy and the few, but are open to all, no matter one's roots, religion or region, no matter the color of one's collar or the color of one's skin.

It is no accident that the first Catholic nominee for the Presidency of the United States, a son of New York State, was a Democrat.

It is no accident that the first woman Vice Presidential nominee, a Catholic, a daughter of Italian heritage—and a daughter of New York State, was a Democrat.

It is no accident that the first Catholic to be elected President of the United States, a son of Massachusetts—and a son of Irish heritage, was a Democrat.

It is no accident that the first born-again Christian to be elected President of the United States, a son of Georgia, was a Democrat.

It is no accident that the two black presidential contenders, one a daughter of New York State, the other a son of South Carolina, have been Democrats.

At any time in our history, the surest political answer to extremism—the surest way to celebrate and renew the true meaning of liberty—is to fulfill the real mission of the Democratic Party.

To afford all Americans an equal opportunity to bring their voices and their values into the political process so long as they, in turn, respect that process by allowing others to do the same without fraud, or fear, or prejudice.

To build a future where every man, woman and child is given an equal opportunity to share in the promise of American life.

To do this, we only need to remember what I learned growing up in Boston: that the best politics is combining the toughness to govern with the compassion to care deeply enough to listen to the people, to respect their concerns, and to address their needs.

The politics of caring, of inclusion, and of values is the best strategy for victory; the proven model for principled, practical, common sense government; the proudest tradition of the Democratic Party; and the essence of the American political heritage of liberty and freedom.

As we celebrate Liberty weekend together and as we take up the Democratic Party's battle today and in the days ahead, recall and take heart from the words of a noted journalist who said of other days and other struggles:

"The lesson of the days through which we are passing is that men and women cannot live upon the achievements of their forefathers, but must themselves renew them. . . . We cannot escape . . . the elementary facts of life—that for a people there is nothing for nothing, that what they have they must themselves make, that what they cherish they must themselves achieve, what they wish to keep they must themselves defend."●

THE RETIREMENT OF LT. GEN. DONALD M. BABERS AND MAJ. GEN. NILES J. FULWYLER

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I want to take a few minutes today to pay tribute to two outstanding Americans and distinguished soldiers, Lt. Gen. Donald M. Babers and Maj. Gen. Niles J. Fulwyler, upon their retirement from active duty. General Babers will retire from the U.S. Army on the first of July 1986 and General Fulwyler retired on the fourth of this month. I would like to say a few words regarding their exemplary careers in the service of their country.

General Babers was born in Newkirk, NM. He graduated from Oklahoma A&M College—(now Oklahoma State University—in 1954 where he was an outstanding student and a record-setting quarterback. He was then commissioned in the U.S. Army as a second lieutenant in the Ordinance Corps.

Since commissioning, the General has held a variety of important command and staff positions culminating in his present assignment as Director of the Defense Logistics Agency. His noteworthy assignments included commander of the 126th Maintenance Battalion, U.S. Army, Europe; commander of the 46th General Support Group, 18th Airborne Corps at Fort Bragg; project manager of the M561/XM705 Truck Vehicle Programs; project manager of the M60 tank production; project manager of the XM1 tank system; and commander of the U.S. Army Communications-Electronics Command, Fort Monmouth, NJ.

General Babers was promoted to the rank of lieutenant general in October 1982 and became the Deputy Commander for Materiel Readiness, U.S. Army Materiel Development and Readiness Command. General Babers also served as the Executive Director for Conventional Ammunition and the Executive Director for Test, Measurement, and Diagnostic Equipment.

General Babers is a much decorated Army Logistician who has served in two overseas theatres, including the Republic of Vietnam. His career has been characterized by untiring efforts to provide equipment and logistics support that would guarantee our soldiers the ability to fight and win. His military decorations include the Defense Distinghished Service Medal with one oak leaf cluster, the Army Distinguished Service Medal, the Legion of Merit with one oak leaf cluster, the Bronze Star, the Purple Heart, the Meritorious Service Medal, and the Army Commendation Medal with two oak leaf clusters.

General Fulwyler, who most recently served for almost 4 years as commanding general of the White Sands Missile Range in New Mexico has had an equally noteworthy career. Born in Homedale, ID, he received his commission in 1952 following graduation from Bowling Green State University where he received a bachelor's degree in political science. He later earned his master's degree in international relations from American University in Washington, DC. He has attended the Field Artillery School, the Infantry School, the Army Command and General Staff College, and the Army War College.

As a career artillery officer, General Fulwyler held a wide variety of important command and staff positions, culminating in assignment as commanding general, White Sands Missile Range. He twice served in Vietnam, first as commander, 2d Battalion, 319th Artillery, 101st Airborne Division, and later as Assistant Chief of Staff, G3—(Operations)—3d Regional Assistance Command.

From August 1973 to June 1974 General Fulwyler served as a member of the 16th senior seminar in foreign policy at the Foreign Service Institute, Department of State, in Washington, DC. He then served as a member of a Special Review Board in the Army's Office of the Deputy Chief of State for Personnel, Washington, DC.

General Fulwyler served at Fort Sill, OK, between February 1975 and May 1977. First, he was commander of the 9th Field Artillery Missile Group, then he commanded the 111 Corps Artillery and again the 9th Corps Artillery Missile Group. In August 1976 he became the Deputy Assistant Commander of the Army Field Artillery School.

After his service at Fort Sill, General Fulwyler became Chief of the Nuclear Activities Branch at Supreme Headquarters Allied Power, Europe. From July 1979 until assuming command at White Sands, Major General Fulwyler served as both the Director of the Nuclear and Chemical Directorate in the Army's Office of the Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations and Plans and the Commanding General of the Army Nuclear and Chemical Agency, both in Washington, DC.

As Commanding General of White Sands Missile Range, General Fulwyler presided over a significant expansion of the range's activities, which has ensured that this test facility will remain at the forefront of military research and development well into the future. Ever conscious of his civic responsibilities, General Fulwyler has been very actively and constructively involved in the communities of Las Cruces, Socorro, and Alamogordo, NM, and El Paso, TX.

General Fulwyler's military awards and decorations include the Defense Superior Service Medal, the Legion of Merit with two oak leaf clusters, the Distinguished Flying Cross, the Bronze Star Medal with two oak leaf clusters, the Purple Heart, several Air Medals, the Joint Service Commendation Medal, and the Army Commendation Medal with one oak leaf cluster.

Mr. President, the Nation has indeed been fortunate to have two men with such talent and character serving in our Armed Forces in key positions for a total of 66 years. I am sure my colleagues would join me in wishing them all the best as they end their illustrious careers in the U.S. Army. I know that we will continue to benefit from what I expect to be very active retirements for both of these fine individuals.●

PHYSICIAN PAYMENT REVIEW COMMISSION

● Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, I want to join my colleagues on the Rural Health Caucus in expressing our appreciation to the Office of Technology Assessment and its Director, Dr. Jack Gibbons, for responding to the concerns raised by the Rural Health Caucus regarding the newly created Physician Payment Review Commission [PhysPRC].

Congress created the Physician Payment Review Commission in order to establish a nonpartisan advisory board that could furnish recommendations on possible ways to readjust physician payment under Medicare. A reassessment of Medicare's current physician payment system will be one of the major reforms undertaken by Congress in the next year, and it is crucial that any adjustments that are made to the system are made with a full knowledge of their impact on rural America and the almost 60 million individuals who live in rural communities.●

TRIBUTE TO GEN. CHARLES A. GABRIEL, CHIEF OF STAFF, U.S. AIR FORCE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, this Friday marks the end of the honorable career of a great airman, patriot, and leader, Gen. Charles A. Gabriel, Chief of Staff of the U.S. Air Force.

From his early years on the playing fields of West Point under Coach Red Blaik, General Gabriel has proven the famous MacArthur statement that, "on the fields of friendly strife are sown the seeds that on other days, and other fields, will bear the fruits of victory." He's seen victory in Mig Alley in Korea and in the skies over the jungles of Southeast Asia. In peace, as well as in war, General Gabriel has consistently displayed integrity, sensitivity to his troops, loyalty to his Nation, and a commitment to peace and freedom that has made our country strong.

On the eve of the Air Force's 40th anniversary, Americans can feel secure in the fact that we have an air combat arm that is second to none. We achieved that position because of the dedication and sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of men and women in the blue uniforms, past and present, under the leadership of such great airmen as Hap Arnold, Tooey Spaatz, Jimmy Doolittle, Ira Eaker, Curt LeMay, Bill Creech, Russ Dougherty, Jerry O'Malley, and Bennie Davis. This list of great leaders would be incomplete without the name Charlie Gabriel.

I'm sure the Members join me in praising this distinguished American for 36 years of dedicated service to his country, and in wishing General Gabriel, his wife Dottie, and his family, all the best in the future.

TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM BROWN, LOYAL ASSISTANT TO THE SENATE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am sorry to learn that Mr. William Brown, who has been a devoted and loyal assistant in the Senate for many, many years, has decided to retire at the end of this week. Mr. Brown is the senior man of a team of dedicated men responsible for keeping our working conditions comfortable and pleasant and for keeping the Senate Chamber maintained in its present splendor for our generation and our descendants to come. He is a friendly and dedicated man who has always done a splendid job.

Mr. Brown started working in the Senate in 1948 and joined the staff of the Sergeant at Arms in 1950. When Mr. Brown first started working here, Senator Wallace White from Maine was the majority leader and Senator Alben Barkley was the minority leader of the Senate. Since that time, Mr. Brown has seen, and had been a part of, a large and fascinating period of our Nation's history. I am sure that he has a wealth of memories and interesting tales about the U.S. Senate that would be a treasure trove to explore.

I know that I speak for all our colleagues when I say that we are sad that Bill Brown is leaving us, but we wish him and his family a most pleasant and well-deserved retirement. May God bless Bill and his faithful wife Rose with many full and happy years ahead.

THE IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE HARRY CLAIBORNE OF NEVADA

Mr. THURMOND. I would like to take this opportunity to update my colleagues on a very important matter which may come before the Senate in the near future. This matter concerns the impeachment of U.S. Federal District Court Judge Harry Claiborne of Nevada. As President pro tempore of the Senate and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, I have been contacted by many individuals regarding this matter. In view of the infrequency of impeachment proceedings and the recent House action, I believe it is useful to generally review the Senate's function in these proceedings.

As my colleagues know, Judge Claiborne was convicted in 1984 of tax evasion and is currently serving his sentence. Judge Claiborne has not resigned from his position, and, therefore, he continues to receive his salary despite his absence from the bench. Furthermore, Judge Claiborne has publicly announced that he intends to resume his duties upon his release from prison.

The House of Representatives has recently initiated impeachment proceedings against Judge Claiborne. The House Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties, and the Administration of Justice has recommended—and today the full House Judiciary Committee approved—four articles of impeachment.

Article I, section 3 of the U.S. Constitution explicitly states that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. This constitutional provision empowers this body with one of its most important and solemn duties—conducting the trial, and sitting as jury during impeachment proceedings. Such a responsibility demands our thoughtful and deliberate attention.

The trial procedure is guided by the Senate Rules of Procedure adopted in the 1868 trial of Andrew Johnson. These procedures are generally followed under arrangements worked out through the Senate leadership. Under these rules, Senate responsibility commences upon notification by the House of Representatives that it has prepared the articles of impeachment and that its appointed managers are ready to present those articles to the Senate. Following the receipt of these articles, the Secretary of the Senate informs the House that the Senate is ready to receive the House managers. On the day following the presentment of the articles, the Senate proceeds with consideration of this matter.

The Presiding Office of the Senate makes necessary procedural rulings and has the power to issue orders and compel the attendance of all necessary witnesses.

The trial begins with the House managers presenting their case and calling witnesses. Each side—the House managers and the defendant—appoints one person to direct the questioning of witnesses. Each side can appoint two persons to deliver the closing arguments. No discussion by Senators is permitted on the floor during the course of the trial. If a Senator wishes to question a witness, that Senator submits the question in writing to the Presiding Officer.

Under the Senate Rules, the Senate can appoint a committee of Senators to receive all evidence and to report its findings to the full Senate for a vote.

At the conclusion of the trial, the Senate votes separately on each article of impeachment. An affirmative vote by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting is required to sustain an article of impeachment. If any article is approved, the accused forfeits his office and the judgment could include that he be prohibited from all future service with the Federal Government.

The possible impeachment proceeding of Judge Claiborne poses a unique case because Judge Claiborne would be the first Federal judge to undergo an impeachment subsequent to a criminal conviction.

Mr. President, I am sure the majority leader will soon be addressing the Senate in greater detail regarding this matter. However, in response to those who have contacted me, I wanted to inform my colleagues of some of the duties we will be called upon to perform in the impeachment proceeding.

URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS BILL

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, just a few hours ago, the Senate approved H.R. 4515, the urgent supplemental appropriations bill, authorizing roughly $1.7 billion in budget authority for 1986.

The Senator from Kansas wants to commend the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Senator HATFIELD, for his outstanding leadership in bringing this bill to passage. His uncanny ability to listen to, and solicit, the views of every Member, as well as his careful scrutiny of each individual issue, have made all his colleagues thankful that he has been on the front line.

I also want to congratulate the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, JOHN STENNIS, for his role in bringing this legislaltion to fruition. During his tenure in the Senate, he has seen many, many appropriation bills come and go, and I, for one, am glad that I could turn to someone with his vast knowledge and experience for guidance and counsel.

Both Senators, and let us not forget their staffs, have spent countless hours crafting a bipartisan package of which we, and the American people, can be proud. Of course, as with any piece of legislation, there were many hurdles and roadblocks along the way. But in the course of reaching an agreement, both Senators maintained the dignity and professionalism unique to this upper body. The U.S. Senate is honored to have two Senators of such high caliber in its midst.

On a final note, I especially want to thank the chairman and ranking member of the Appropriations Committee, and the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee chairman, Mr. STEVENS, for their assistance in maintaining the university research funding provision. And as a Senator from Kansas, it is good to know that the Commodity Credit Corporation program will continue to make funds available to our Nation's farmers.

ORDER TO HOLD SENATE RESOLUTION 441 AT THE DESK

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk on behalf of myslef and the distinguished minority leader and ask unanimous consent that it be read and that it then be held at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A RESOLUTION (S. Res. 441) to modify the provisions of S. Res. 28, relating to television in the Senate, to continue television coverage of the Senate until such time as the Senate votes on the question of continuing such coverage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request to hold the measure at the desk? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution reads as follows:

S. RES. 441

Resolved, That, notwithstanding any other provision of S. Res. 28, agreed to February 27, 1986, television coverage of the Senate shall continue under the same basis as provided during the live test period under section 5 of S. Res. 28 unless the Senate votes pursuant to section 15 of S. Res. 28 to end coverage.

DON'T PULL THE PLUG!

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we are now 23 days into our grand experiment called "Senate TV." During that time, the American people and their Senate have come to know each other a little better. We may not be number one in the Neilsen ratings, but at least we are now only a dial away from millions of viewers. We have had our share of glitches, dead air, and more than a little showboating, so there is still room for improvement. Let us hope the novelty of television is wearing off for all of us.

LET'S STAY ON THE AIR

In my view, I believe the combination of TV and the tax bill has put real momentum behind our efforts to keep the Senate a dial away from the people.

And so Mr. President, today I am pleased the distinguished minority leader is joining me in the decision not to pull the plug on the American people. Let us stay on the air and continue our experiment on the airwaves. There's really no reason to turn off the cameras. We have reviewed the experiment on a daily basis—each side has an ad hoc committee studying it—so there's nothing to gain from disappearing for 2 weeks.

CONSISTENCY IS THE KEY

We have tentatively staked-out a place on the crowded dials of American television and radios. We should stay there. Consistency is the key, Mr. President, and unless we maintain a consistent presence I am concerned we could squander the tremendous strides Senate television has taken in a few short weeks. If we are serious about building a bridge to our electorate—and keeping it—we had better reconsider the decision to let the Chamber "fade to black."

By the same token, if we are serious about performing for the people—not the cameras—then we should also take a hard look at ourselves and our conduct so far on the TV screen.

By now, our viewers have discovered something we have known for years: The Senate is one confusing place! Let's not confuse them any further by dropping from sight.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT REQUEST

ORDERS FOR MONDAY, JULY 14, 1986

Mr. DOLE. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate convenes on Monday, July 14, the reading of the Journal be dispensed with, no resolutions come over under the rule, the call of the calendar be dispensed with, and following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order there be special orders in favor of following Senators for not to exceed 5 minutes each: Senators PROXMIRE, and MELCHER, to be followed by a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each; provided further that the morning hour be deemed to have expired.

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEES TO FILE REPORTS

I further ask unanimous consent that committees be authorized to file reports between the hours of 10 a.m., and 3 p.m., on Tuesday, July 8.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I am sure I will not object, but would the distinguished majority leader, before he puts the request, state what the program will be for Monday and Tuesday, as near as he can?

PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, on Monday, we hope to take up the reauthorization of the ACTION Agency, S. 2324, and the reauthorization of health programs, S. 2444.

I am not certain that those would require rollcall votes. If that is the case on Monday, that will be set over until Tuesday. But I am advised that each would take maybe a couple or 3 hours. So there will be business on that day. I think I could say that any rollcall votes would occur on Tuesday.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader. If he will bear with me further, does the distinguished majority leader plan to proceed with the treaties early?

Mr. DOLE. Yes; I think what I would like to do is make certain everyone on each side is here, and if that is the case, maybe we could have the vote following the policy luncheons on Tuesday.

Mr. BYRD. One final question: Does the distinguished majority leader intend to resume consideration of the Manion nomination early that week, or midweek, or can he state at this point beyond that?

Mr. DOLE. I can only speculate. Again, hopefully we can do it Tuesday, the 15th. But again, as the majority leader knows, it is a one-vote margin either way. I would want to make certain that every Member is present, particularly every Member on this side.

Mr. BYRD. The distinguished majority leader I assume would give all Members ample notice of the intention.

Mr. DOLE. I will consult with the minority leader before I make any effort to move to table the motion to reconsider and go into executive session.

Mr. BYRD. Would it be a fair assumption that the distinguished majority leader would give all Senators at least 24 hours' notice for resuming consideration?

Mr. DOLE. We will try to determine early Monday when we come back if everyone will be here on Tuesday, and then we can give notice. I could give notice to the minority leader say about 1 o'clock on Monday, and about 24 hours later then we would vote.

Mr. BYRD. So the distinguished majority leader would give notice at least 24 hours so that all Senators on both sides would know that the Senate is going to resume consideration of the nomination.

Mr. DOLE. I would say now that I think Senators ought to be on notice that that is the intention of the majority leader. Obviously, if someone is ill or otherwise is detained, that would be a factor. Of course, if someone decides that they do not want to be here for the vote, that is their judgment. But we will try to make thorough inquiry and be in a position to give the information. I would guess we would do it between 12 noon and 2 in the afternoon on Monday, the 14th of July.

Mr. BYRD. I say to the distinguished Senator that I do not mean to belabor the point. The distinguished Senator is thinking then in the context of that answer that there would be at least 24 hours' notice prior to any action by the distinguished majority leader in resuming the consideration of that nomination.

Mr. DOLE. That is correct.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. President, I have no objection to the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TIME AGREEMENT ON NOMINATION OF TERRENCE M. SCANLON

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I wonder if it is possible, and if I can ask the distinguished minority leader if we can reach some agreement on the nomination of Terrence M. Scanlon to be Chairman of the Consumer Products Safety Commission.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I think the distinguished majority leader and I have now conferred about the time agreement. This is a time agreement which the distinguished majority leader is about to propound which has been cleared by all Members on this side. We are prepared for the distinguished majority leader to proceed.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that at 2 p.m. on Tuesday, July 15, the Senate go into executive session to consider the nomination of Terrence M. Scanlon, to the Chairman of the Consumer Product Safety Commission, and it be considered under the following time agreement:

Two hours on the nomination to be equally divided between the chairman of the Commerce Committee and the ranking minority member, or their designees;

And no motion to recommit the nomination be in order;

And that following the conclusion or yielding back of time, the Senate proceed to vote on the nomination of Terrence Scanlon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Hearing no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. That might alter the time we had on the treaty vote. But I think it is important that we do this.

Just to recap, on July 14, we will convene at 12 noon following adjournment.

Under the standing order the leaders have 10 minutes each, followed by special orders in favor of Senator PROXMIRE and Senator MELCHER not to exceed 5 minutes each.

There will be routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

Following morning business it will be the intention of the majority leader to turn to either the reauthorization of the ACTION Agency or reauthorization of health services programs. Hopefully we can complete action on those two matters.

As I have indicated, if rollcall votes are required, they will be postponed until the following day, Tuesday, July 15.

Then we will have the vote on the Scanlon nomination.

There could be further action with reference to the Manion nomination, as indicated not without giving notice to the distinguished minority leader hopefully at least 24 hours in advance. We hope to have that information available.

We can certainly count on three or four votes, I would say, on Tuesday.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY, JULY 14, 1986

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I move the Senate stand in adjournment in accordance with the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 364 until 12 noon on Monday, July 14, 1986.

The motion was agreed to; and, at 12:19 a.m., the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 14, 1986, at 12 noon.

SEC. 137. DEDUCTIBILITY OF STATE AND LOCAL SALES, REAL AND PERSONAL PROPERTY, AND INCOME TAXES.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Senate finds that—

(1) a deduction for State and local taxes has been allowed by Federal income tax law since 1861,

(2) the deduction for State and local taxes is a cornerstone of Federalism, protecting State revenue sources from the effects of double taxation and allowing State and local governments the flexibility to develop tax structures without Federal interference,

(3) elimination of the deduction for State and local taxes would constitute an unjustified Federal intrusion into the fiscal affairs of States and prejudice the right of State and local governments to select appropriate revenue measures,

(4) elimination or restriction of the deductibility of some State and local taxes would encourage States to shift tax levies to taxes which continue to be deductible, increasing the tax burden of certain segments of the population and undermining the ability of State and local governments to raise revenue,

(5) the deduction for State and local sales taxes is the single most popular deduction in the Internal Revenue Code of 1954,

(6) the revenue measures selected by a State should not significantly alter the value of the Federal deduction for State and local taxes paid by its citizens,

(7) sales taxes are used by some State and local governments as general purpose taxes, while other jurisdictions use income and property taxes as general purpose taxes,

(8) funding for public education, the largest category of expenditure for State and local governments, would be affected by any restriction on the deduction for State and local taxes, and

(9) the sales tax is the largest source of revenue for all States combined.

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that any tax reform legislation should preserve the full deduction for State and local sales, real and personal property, and income taxes.

(e) NORMALIZATION REQUIREMENTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—A normalization method of accounting shall not be treated as being used with respect to any public utility property for purposes of section 167 or 168 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 if the taxpayer, in computing its cost of service for ratemaking purposes and reflecting operating results in its regulated books of account, reduces the excess tax reserve more rapidly or to a greater extent than such reserve would be reduced under the average rate assumption method.

(2) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this subsection—

(A) EXCESS TAX RESERVE.—The term "excess tax reserve" means the excess of—

(i) the reserve for deferred taxes (as described in section 167(l)(3)(G)(ii) or 168(e)(3)(B)(ii) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 as in effect on the day before the date of the enactment of this Act), over

(ii) the amount which would be the balance in such reserve if the amount of such reserve were determined by assuming that the corporate rate reductions provided in this Act were in effect for all prior periods.

(B) AVERAGE RATE ASSUMPTION METHOD.—The average rate assumption method is the method under which the excess in the reserve for deferred taxes is reduced over the remaining lives of the property as used in its regulated books of account which gave rise to the reserve for deferred taxes. Under such method, if timing differences for the property reverse, the amount of the adjustment to the reserve for the deferred taxes is calculated by multiplying—

(i) the ratio of the aggregate deferred taxes for the property to the aggregate timing differences for the property as of the beginning of the period in question, by

(ii) the amount of the timing differences which reverse during such period.

(f) SPECIAL RULE FOR CERTAIN LEASED PROPERTY.—The provisions of section 168(f)(8) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (as amended by section 209 of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982) shall continue to apply to any transaction permitted by reason of section 12(c)(2) of the Tax Reform Act of 1984 or section 209(d)(1)(B) of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982.

(g) RAILROAD GRADING AND TUNNEL BORES.—

(1) In the case of expenditures for railroad grading and tunnel bores which were incurred by a common carrier by railroad to replace property destroyed in a disaster occurring on or about April 17, 1983, near Thistle, Utah, such expenditures, to the extent not in excess of $15,000,000, shall be treated as recovery property which is in the 5-year class under section 168 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (as in effect before the amendments made by this Act) and which is placed in service at the time such expenditures were incurred.

(2) Business interruption proceeds received for loss of use, revenues, or profits in connection with the disaster described in paragraph (1) and devoted by the taxpayer described in paragraph (1) to the construction of replacement track and related grading and tunnel bore expenditures shall be treated as constituting an amount received from the involuntary conversion of property under section 1033(a)(2) of such Code.

(3) This subsection shall apply to taxable years ending after April 17, 1983.

"(A) the total interest expense of the expanded affiliated group which includes such affiliated group, multiplied by

"(B) a percentage equal to the ratio which the foreign assets of the expanded affiliated group bears to all assets of the expanded affiliated group.

"(2) TREATMENT OF FOREIGN SUBSIDIARY INTEREST EXPENSE.—Interest expense allocated to foreign source income under the rules of paragraph (1) shall be reduced (but not below zero) by any interest expense incurred by any foreign corporation in the expanded affiliated group to the extent such interest would have been allocated and apportioned to foreign source income of such corporation if this subsection were applied separately to all foreign corporations in the expanded affiliated group as if such corporations were an affiliated group. A similar reduction shall be made in the case of a corporation described in section 1504(b)(4).

"(3) GROSS INCOME METHOD MAY NOT BE USED FOR INTEREST.—All allocations and apportionments of interest expense shall be made on the basis of assets rather than gross income.

"(4) TAX-EXEMPT ASSETS NOT TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT.—For purposes of allocating and apportioning any deductible expense, any tax-exempt asset (and any income from such an asset) shall not be taken into account. A similar rule shall apply in the case of any dividend (other than a qualifying dividend as defined in section 243(b)) for which a deduction is allowable under section 243 or 245(a) and any stock the dividends on which would be so deductible and would not be qualifying dividends (as so defined).

If a borrowing is not treated as qualified indebtedness solely because it is guaranteed (or otherwise facilitated) by another corporation, then—

"(i) such borrowing shall be treated as the borrowing of such other corporation if such other corporation is at a higher level in the chain of includible corporations than the borrowing corporation, or

"(ii) if such other corporation is in a different chain of includible corporations, such borrowing shall be treated as the borrowing of the first common parent of the borrowing corporation and the guaranteeing corporation.

"(II) 25 percent of its average annual earnings and profits for such 5-taxable year period, or

"(ii) deals with any related party in any manner not clearly reflecting the income of the corporation, an amount of qualified indebtedness equal to the excess distribution or the understatement or overstatement of income, as the case may be, shall be recharacterized for purposes of this paragraph as nonqualified indebtedness. If a corporation has not been in existence for 5 taxable years, this paragraph shall be applied with respect to the period it was in existence.

"(E) EFFECT OF ELECTION ON GROUP.—If 1 member of an affiliated group makes an election under subparagraph (A), all members of such group shall be treated as having made such election.

"(7) ALLOCATION OF OTHER EXPENSES.—Except as otherwise provided in regulations, expenses (other than interest and research and development expenses) which are not directly allocable to any specific income producing activity shall be allocated as if all members of the affiliated group were a single corporation.

SEC. 1204A. FINDINGS.

The Senate believes that Americans should be encouraged to save for their retirement; and

The Senate recognizes that only slightly more than one-half of all civilian employees are covered by employer-sponsored retirement plans and, of those employees, only half are now vested in their benefits; and

Over 70 percent of all taxpayers who have established individual retirement accounts have annual incomes of under $50,000; and

The Senate recognizes that taxapayers should be able to adequately provide for their retirement security, cannot rely on Social Security alone, and should be encouraged to provide for their retirement through tax incentives:

It is the sense of the Senate—

(1) that the Senate conferees on the Tax Reform Act of 1986 give highest priority to retaining maximum possible tax benefits for individual retirement accounts to encourage their use as a principal vehicle for ensuring retirement security, and

(2) that the retention of the tax benefit of individual retirement accounts should be accomplished in a manner which does not adversely affect the tax rates or distribution by income class of tax reduction otherwise provided for in the Tax Reform Act of 1986.

Subpart B—Other Provisions

SEC. 1205. $7,000 LIMITATION ON ELECTIVE DEFERRALS.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Section 402 (relating to taxability of beneficiary of employees' trust) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g) LIMITATION ON EXCLUSION FOR ELECTIVE DEFERRALS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding subsections (a)(8) and (h)(1)(B), the elective deferrals of any individual for any taxable year shall be included in such individual's gross income to the extent the amount of such deferrals for the taxable year exceeds $7,000.

"(2) REQUIRED DISTRIBUTION OF EXCESS DEFERRALS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—If any amount (hereinafter in this paragraph referred to as 'excess deferrals') is included in the gross income of an individual under paragraph (1) for any taxable year—

"(i) not later than the 1st March 1 following the close of the taxable year, the individual may allocate the amount of such excess deferrals among the plans under which the deferrals were made and may notify each such plan of the portion allocated to it, and

"(ii) not later than the 1st April 15 following the close of the taxable year, each such plan may distribute to the individual the amount allocated to it under clause (i) (and any income allocable to such amount).

The distribution described in clause (ii) may be made notwithstanding any other provision of law.

"(B) TREATMENT OF DISTRIBUTION UNDER SECTION 401(k).—EXCEPT TO THE EXTENT PROVIDED BY THE SECRETARY, ANY PORTION OF AN EXCESS DEFERRAL DISTRIBUTED FROM A PLAN UNDER SUBPARAGRAPH (A)(II) SHALL, FOR PURPOSES OF APPLYING SECTION 401(K)(3)(A)(II), BE TREATED AS IF IT HAD NOT BEEN DISTRIBUTED UNDER THE PLAN.

"(C) TAXATION OF DISTRIBUTION.—In the case of a distribution under subparagraph (A)—

"(i) such distribution shall not be included in gross income except to the extent attributable to the income on the excess deferral, and

"(ii) no tax shall be imposed under section 72(t).

In the case of such a distribution, any income described in clause (i) shall, for purposes of section 61, be deemed to have been earned and received in the taxable year in which such excess deferral is made.

"(3) ELECTIVE DEFERRALS.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'elective deferrals' means, with respect to any taxable year, the sum of—

"(A) any employer contribution under a qualified cash or deferred arrangement (as defined in section 401(k)) to the extent not includible in gross income for the taxable year under subsection (a)(8) (determined without regard to this subsection), and

"(C) DISTRIBUTION IF SECURITIES NOT ALLOCATED.—If employer securities described in subparagraph (B) cease to be allocated to the participant at any time during the 3-taxable year period described in subparagraph (B), then such securities shall be treated for purposes of this chapter as having been distributed to such participant as of the date on which such securities are no longer allocated to the participant's account.

"(D) EMPLOYER SECURITIES.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'employer securities' has the meaning given such term by section 409(l).

"(6) COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENT.—The Secretary shall adjust the $7,000 amount under paragraph (1) at the same time and in the same manner as under section 415(d).

"(7) DISREGARD OF COMMUNITY PROPERTY LAWS.—This subsection shall be applied without regard to community property laws.

"(8) COORDINATION WITH SECTION 72.—For purposes of applying section 72, any amount includible in gross income for any taxable year under this subsection but which is not distributed from the plan during such taxable year shall not be treated as investment in the contract."

(2) DEFERRALS UNDER COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AGREEMENTS.—In the case of a plan maintained pursuant to 1 or more collective bargaining agreements between employee representatives and 1 or more employers ratified before March 1, 1986, the amendment made by subsection (a) shall not apply to contributions made pursuant to such an agreement for taxable years beginning before the earlier of—

PART II—NONDISCRIMINATION REQUIREMENTS

Subpart A—General Requirements

SEC. 1211. APPLICATION OF NONDISCRIMINATION RULES TO INTEGRATED PLANS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 401(l) (relating to nondiscriminatory coordination of defined contribution plans with OASDI) is amended to read as follows:

"(l) PERMITTED DISPARITY IN PLAN CONTRIBUTIONS OR BENEFITS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The requirements of this subsection are met with respect to any plan if—

"(A) in the case of a defined contribution plan, the requirements of paragraph (2) are met, and

"(B) in the case of a defined benefit plan, the requirements of paragraph (3) are met.

"(2) DEFINED CONTRIBUTION PLAN.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—A defined contribution plan meets the requirements of this paragraph for a year if the excess contribution percentage does not exceed the lesser of—

"(i) 200 percent of the base contribution percentage, or

"(ii) the sum of—

"(I) the base contribution percentage, plus

"(II) a percentage equal to the rate of tax in effect under section 3111(a) as of the beginning of the year.

"(B) CONTRIBUTION PERCENTAGES.—For purposes of this paragraph—

"(i) EXCESS CONTRIBUTION PERCENTAGE.—The term 'excess contribution percentage' means the percentage of remuneration which is contributed under the plan with respect to that portion of remuneration in excess of the compensation level specified under the plan for the year.

"(ii) BASE CONTRIBUTION PERCENTAGE.—The term 'base contribution percentage' means the percentage of remuneration contributed under the plan with respect to that portion of remuneration not in excess of the compensation level specified under the plan for the year.

"(3) DEFINED BENEFIT PLAN.—A defined benefit plan meets the requirements of this paragraph for a year if—

"(A) EXCESS PLANS.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a plan other than an offset plan—

"(I) the excess benefit percentage does not exceed 200 percent of the base benefit percentage, and

"(II) any optional form of benefit, preretirement benefit, actuarial factor, or other benefit or feature provided with respect to remuneration in excess of the compensation level is provided with respect to remuneration not in excess of such level.

"(ii) BENEFIT PERCENTAGES.—For purposes of this subparagraph, the excess and base benefit percentages shall be computed in the same manner as the excess and base contribution percentages under paragraph (2)(B), except that such determination shall be made on the basis of benefits rather than contributions.

"(B) OFFSET PLANS.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—In the case of an offset plan, the plan provides that a participant's accrued benefit attributable to employer contributions (within the meaning of section 411(c)(1)) may not be reduced by reason of the offset by more than 50 percent of such benefit which would have accrued without regard to such reduction.

"(ii) OFFSET PLAN.—For purposes of this subparagraph, the term 'offset plan' means any plan with respect to which the normal retirement benefit attributable to employer contributions for each participant is reduced by the dollar amount specified in the plan and which is applicable to all participants.

"(4) DEFINITIONS.—

"(A) COMPENSATION LEVEL.—The term 'compensation level' means the lesser of—

"(i) the dollar amount of remuneration which is specified under the plan as the compensation level for a plan year, or

"(ii) the contribution and benefit base under section 230 of the Social Security Act in effect at the beginning of the plan year.

Such level shall apply with respect to all participants under the plan.

"(B) REMUNERATION.—The term 'remuneration' means total compensation, or basic or regular compensation, whichever is used in determining contributions or benefits under the plan.

"(C) COMPENSATION, ETC., OF SELF-EMPLOYED INDIVIDUALS.—For purposes of this subsection, in the case of an individual who is an employee within the meaning of subsection (c)(1)—

"(i) the employee's total compensation shall include the employee's earned income (as defined in subsection (c)(2)), and

"(ii) the employee's basic or regular rate of compensation shall be determined (under regulations prescribed by the Secretary) with respect to that portion of the employee's earned income which bears the same ratio to the employee's earned income as the basic or regular compensation of the employees under the plan (other than employees within the meaning of subsection (c)(1)) bears to the total compensation of such employees.

"(D) MULTIPLE PLANS.—If a highly compensated employee (within the meaning of section 414(q)) participates in 2 or more plans maintained by the employer which fail to meet the requirements of subsection (a)(4) (without regard to this subsection), this subsection shall be applied by taking into account for each of such plans contributions and benefits for such employee under all such plans.

"(E) REGULATIONS.—The Secretary shall prescribe such regulations as are necessary or appropriate to carry out the purposes of this subsection.

"(5) SPECIAL RULE FOR PLAN MAINTAINED BY RAILROADS.—In determining whether a plan which includes employees of a railroad employer who are entitled to benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1974 meets the requirements of this subsection, the benefit percentages of such employees shall be computed by taking into account the employees' benefits under the plan, the employees' tier 2 railroad retirement benefits and any supplemental annuity under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1974."

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Subsection (a)(5) of section 401 is amended to read as follows:

"(5) SPECIAL RULES RELATING TO NONDISCRIMINATION REQUIREMENTS.—

"(A) SALARIED OR CLERICAL EMPLOYEES.—A classification shall not be considered unreasonable within the meaning of paragraph (4) or section 410(b) (without regard to paragraph (1)(A) thereof) merely because it is limited to salaried or clerical employees.

"(B) CONTRIBUTIONS AND BENEFITS MAY BEAR UNIFORM RELATIONSHIP TO COMPENSATION.—A plan shall not be considered discriminatory within the meaning of paragraph (4) or section 410(b) (without regard to paragraph (1)(A) thereof) merely because the contributions or benefits of, or on behalf of, the employees under the plan bear a uniform relationship to the total compensation, or the basic or regular rate of compensation, of such employees.

"(C) CERTAIN DISPARITY PERMITTED.—A plan shall not be considered discriminatory within the meaning of paragraph (4) merely because the contributions and benefits of or on behalf of the employees under the plan favor highly compensated employees (as defined in section 414(q)) in the manner permitted under subsection (l).

"(D) INTEGRATED DEFINED BENEFIT PLAN.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—A defined benefit plan shall not be considered discriminatory within the meaning of paragraph (4) merely because the plan provides that the employer-provided accrued retirement benefit for any participant may not exceed the excess (if any) of—

"(I) the participant's final pay with the employer, over

"(II) the employer-provided retirement benefit created under Federal law attributable to service by the participant with the employer.

"(ii) FINAL PAY.—For purposes of this subparagraph, the participant's final pay is the compensation (as defined in section 415(c)(3)) paid to the participant by the employer for the year ending during the 5-year period ending with the year in which the participant separated from service for the employer for which the participant's total compensation from the employer was highest.

"(E) TOTAL COMPENSATION OF SELF-EMPLOYED INDIVIDUALS.—For purposes of this paragraph (other than subparagraph (D)) and paragraph (10), the total compensation of an individual who is an employee within the meaning of subsection (c)(1) means such individual's earned income (as defined in subsection (c)(2)), and the basic or regular rate of compensation of such an individual shall be determined, in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary, with respect to that portion of the individual's earned income which bears the same ratio to his earned income as the basic or regular compensation of the employees under the plan bears to the total compensation of such employees.

"(F) 2 OR MORE PLANS TREATED AS SINGLE PLAN.—For purposes of determining whether 2 or more plans of an employer satisfy the requirements of paragraph (4) when considered as a single plan—

"(i) CONTRIBUTIONS.—If the amount of contributions on behalf of the employees allowed as a deduction under section 404 for the taxable year with respect to such plans, taken together, bears a uniform relationship to the total compensation, or the basic or regular rate of compensation, of such employees, the plans shall not be considered discriminatory merely because the rights of employees to, or derived from, the employer contributions under the separate plans do not become nonforfeitable at the same rate.

"(ii) BENEFITS.—If the employees' rights to benefits under the separate plans do not become nonforfeitable at the same rate, but the levels of benefits provided by the separate plans satisfy the requirements of regulations prescribed by the Secretary to take account of the differences in such rates, the plans shall not be considered discriminatory merely because of the difference in such rates.

"(G) SIMPLIFIED EMPLOYEE PENSIONS.—For purposes of determining whether 1 or more plans of an employer satisfy the requirements of paragraph (4) and of section 410(b), an employer may take into account all simplified employee pensions (other than arrangements under section 408(k)(6))."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—

(B) January 1, 1991.

"(2) ALTERNATIVE METHOD OF MEETING REASONABLE CLASSIFICATION TEST.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—A plan shall be treated as meeting the requirements of paragraph (1)(B) for any plan year if—

An election under this clause, once made, may be revoked only with the consent of the Secretary.

"(D) SPECIAL RULES WHERE EMPLOYEES ARE IN MORE THAN 1 GROUP.—In the case of an employee who is a participant in 1 or more alternative plans and in 1 or more plans other than alternative plans—

"(3) EXCLUSION OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES.—For purposes of this subsection, there shall be excluded from consideration—

"(A) employees not included in the plan who are included in a unit of employees covered by an agreement which the Secretary of Labor finds to be a collective bargaining agreement between employee representatives and one or more employers, if there is evidence that retirement benefits were the subject of good faith bargaining between such employee representatives and such employer or employers,

"(II) no additional employer contributions shall be permitted to an employee stock ownership plan described in subparagraph (A) of the employer before the allocation of such amount, and

"(D) at least half of the participants in such qualified plan are participants in such employee stock ownership plan (as of the close of the 1st plan year for which an allocation of such securities is required),

"(2) AVERAGE EXCLUSION RATIO.—For purposes of this subsection—

"(C) CAFETERIA PLAN.—For purposes of this subparagraph, a plan which, but for the fact that an employee may not choose cash or a taxable benefit, would be treated as a cafeteria plan shall be so treated.

"(4) SPECIAL RULES FOR ACCIDENT AND HEALTH PLANS.—For purposes of determining whether the requirements of this subsection are met with respect to accident or health plans (within the meaning of paragraph (2) of subsection (j)), the employer may elect—

"(A) except in the case of a cafeteria plan (within the meaning of paragraph (3)) providing benefits other than accident or health benefits, to disregard any employee if such employee and his spouse and dependents (if any) are covered by an accident or health plan maintained by another employer, and

"(B) to apply this subsection separately with respect to coverage of spouses or dependents under such plan or plans and to take into account with respect to such coverage only employees with spouses or dependents who are not covered by an accident or health plan maintained by another employer.

Any employer who elects the application of this paragraph shall obtain and maintain, in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe, adequate sworn statements to demonstrate whether individuals have spouses, dependents, or other accident or health coverage.

"(E) Employees who have not attained age 21 (or such earlier age as may be specified in the plan).

"(F) Employees who are nonresident aliens and who receive no earned income (within the meaning of section 911(d)(2)) from the employer which constitutes income from sources within the United States (within the meaning of section 861(a)(3)).

"(2) CERTAIN EXCLUSIONS NOT TO APPLY IF EXCLUDED EMPLOYEES COVERED.—Except to the extent provided in regulations, employees shall not be excluded from consideration under any subparagraph of paragraph (1) (other than subparagraph (F)), as the case may be, unless no employee described in such subparagraph benefits under the plan.

"(3) EXCLUSION MUST BE APPLICABLE TO ALL PLANS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—An exclusion shall be applicable under any subparagraph of paragraph (1) (other than subparagraph (D) or (F) thereof) only if the exclusion applies to all employee benefit plans of the employer described in the same paragraph of subsection (j). "(6) SPECIAL RULES FOR CERTAIN DISPOSITIONS OR ACQUISITIONS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—If a person becomes, or ceases to be, a member of a group described in subsection (b), (c), (m), or (o) of section 414, then the requirements of this section shall be treated as having been met during the transition period with respect to any plan covering employees of such person or any other member of such group if—

"(2) COORDINATION WITH MEDICARE, ETC.—A plan shall not fail to meet the requirements of subsection (d) with respect to health benefits merely because the amount of such benefits provided to any employee or family member of any employee are coordinated (in a manner which does not discriminate in favor of highly compensated employees) with health benefits provided under any

It is the policy of the Congress that such plans be used in a wide variety of corporate financing transactions as a means of encouraging employers to include their employees as beneficiaries of such transactions. The Congress is deeply concerned that the objectives sought by the series of applicable laws and this Act will be made unattainable by regulations and rulings which treat employee stock ownership plans as conventional retirement plans under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974, which reduce the freedom of employee stock ownership trusts and employers to take the necessary steps to utilize employee stock ownership plans in a wide variety of corporate transactions, and which otherwise impede the establishment and success of these plans.

(b) FISCAL YEARS 1988 AND 1989.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a tax reform revenue shortfall for fiscal year 1988 or 1989 shall be taken into account in determining the total revenues for such fiscal year for the purposes described in paragraphs (1) through (4) of subsection (a) only to the extent that such shortfall is not offset by tax reform revenue windfalls for fiscal years 1986 and 1987. (c) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section—

(1) the term "tax reform revenue windfall" means, with respect to a fiscal year, any revenues (as estimated in accordance with subsection (d)) accruing to the Treasury of the United States during the fiscal year under the revenue laws of the United States, as amended by the Tax Reform Act of 1986, that are in excess of the revenues (as so estimated) that would have accrued to the Treasury of the United States during the fiscal year under the revenue laws of the United States as in effect on the day before the date of the enactment of such Act; and

(2) the term "tax reform revenue shortfall" means, with respect to a fiscal year, the amount by which the revenues (as estimated in accordance with subsection (d)) accruing to the Treasury of the United States during the fiscal year under the revenue laws of the United States, as amended by the Tax Reform Act of 1986, are less than the revenues (as so estimated) that would have accrued to the Treasury of the United States during the fiscal year under the revenue laws of the United States as in effect on the day before the date of the enactment of such Act.

(d) DETERMINATION OF AMOUNTS.—The amount of any tax reform revenue windfall or tax reform revenue shortfall for a fiscal year shall be determined as of the date of the enactment of the Tax Reform Act of 1986—

(1) by the Congressional Budget Office (using revenue estimates made by the Joint Committee on Taxation in accordance with section 273 of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985), for the purposes specified in paragraphs (1) and (2) of subsection (a), and for purposes of carrying out the duties of the legislative branch under the provisions specified in paragraph (3) of such subsection, and

SEC. 1719. MORATORIUM ON TAX LEGISLATION.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) constant and conflicting policy changes in the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (hereinafter referred to as the "Tax Code") make it difficult for individuals to properly plan for the future,

(2) constant and conflicting policy changes by the Congress retard capital formation by increasing the risk of a project,

(3) constant and conflicting policy changes by the Congress place undue burdens on individuals and businesses by requiring utilization of financial resources to anticipate such changes and modifications in the Tax Code,

(4) the Internal Revenue Service is drained of limited resources in trying to adapt to changes in the Tax Code,

(5) one of the greatest burdens placed upon small businesses is the completion of paperwork to comply with the Tax Code, and constant changes by Congress unnecessarily compound this paperwork burden,

(6) any tax reform legislation passed by the Congress should stimulate economic growth, encourage investment, promote capital formation, expand job opportunities, and encourage savings, and

(7) the American taxpayer deserves certainty in the tax treatment of economic decisions.

(b) SENSE OF CONGRESS.—It is the sense of the Congress that the provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 which are added or amended by this Act remain unchanged for at least 5 years in order to provide stability for the American taxpayer and the private sector.

SEC. 1720. SENSE OF THE SENATE ON REVENUE FLUCTUATIONS.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Senate finds that—

(1) the Committee on Finance amendment to H.R. 3838 (an Act to reform the internal revenue laws of the United States) produces revenues that—

(A) exceed current-law revenues (the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) revenue baseline) by—

(i) $7,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1986,

(ii) $23,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1987, and

(iii) $11,000,000 in fiscal year 1991, and

(B) fall below current-law revenues by—

(i) $21,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1988,

(ii) $21,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1989, and

(iii) $400,000,000 in fiscal year 1990;

(2) the Committee amendment satisfies revenue neutrality over a six-year period, but the revenue shortfalls in fiscal years 1988 and 1989 will make the attainment of the Gramm-Rudman deficit goals more difficult;

(3) numerous options for restraining yearly revenue fluctuations without affecting the fundamental fabric of the Committee amendment are available to the committee of conference on H.R. 3838, in the form of altering effective dates, phasing-in certain provisions, and resolving the major differences in the provisions for broadening the tax base contained in H.R. 3838 and the Committee amendment;

(4) in some instances, leveling the revenue fluctuations could result in a further reduction in tax burdens on individuals and corporations in 1987; and

(5) altering the provisions of the Committee amendment to achieve a more stable revenue outlook would eliminate the need to resort to artificial accounting conventions, such as the use of a trust fund that would deviate from the actual cash flows to and from the Treasury.

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that the committee of conference on H.R. 3838 should report Federal tax reform legislation that produces a revenue path with minimal revenue fluctuations.

SEC. 1722. SPECIAL RELIEF FOR FLOOD DISASTER VICTIMS.

(1) section 165(h)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 shall be applied with respect to any loss of an individual arising from such disaster by substituting "1 percent" for "10 percent", and

(2) at the election of the taxpayer, the amendments made by section 201 of this Act—

(i) shall not apply to any property placed in service during 1987 or 1988, or

(ii) shall apply to any property placed in service during 1985 or 1986, which is property to replace property lost, damaged, or destroyed in such disaster.

(b) DISASTER TO WHICH SECTION APPLIES.—This section shall apply to a flood which occurred on November 3 through 7, 1985, and which was declared a natural disaster area by the President of the United States.
